NAVIGATING NATIONAL SECURITY STATE SECRETS: SEEKING THE TRUTH ABOUT CHEMTRAILS AND HAARP TECHNOLOGY

by Elana Freeland, MA

Planet Earth.

The first Earth Day on April 20, 1970 seems eons ago—the brainchild of Senator Gaylord Nelson (D-WI) and beginning of an environmental decade loaded with green legislation and new federal agencies supposedly created to implement the Occupational Safety and Health Administration, Clean Air Act, National Environment Policy Act, Clean Water Act, Noise Control Act, Endangered Species Act, the Superfund, and Alaska National Interest Lands Act.

Almost half a century later, Earth Day rolls on but those once-hopeful agencies are now serving corporate agendas that destroy, not protect, the Earth. By 2004, BBC News was quoting from “The Earth’s Threatened Life-Support System: A Global Wake-Up Call” regarding the coming uncharted waters of an Anthropocene epoch, “the geologic epoch in which humans are a significant and sometimes dominating environmental force . . . sailing into planetary terra incognita . . . unsure of just how serious our interference with Earth system dynamics will prove to be . . .” Attribution of Anthropocene blame veers between carbons and overpopulation with nary a mention of stratospheric aerosol geoengineering (SAG) or solar radiation management (SRM), and never of chemtrails and ionospheric heaters like HAARP and the military agendas they harbinger.

The technological Space Age we are entering is very different from the one envisioned by President John F. Kennedy. In fact, if the military mindset has its way, all of Planet Earth will be militarized under its doctrine of full spectrum dominance. Blaming the public’s “CNN syndrome” (desire to be informed) for its “battlefield attrition,” the military branches now “look/act like SOCOM [Special Operations Command]” (keep secrets and lie). Everything under the Sun is to be weaponized under “ubiquitous multiphysics, hyperspectral sensors, precision strikes, volumetric weaponry, swarms and hardened munitions”; “non-explosive warfare” such as psywar, biowar, IT/net war, “anti-operability war,” beam weaponry, RF spoofing/camo, and “alternative power projection approaches (e.g., the deep water depth/death sphere).”

Ever so quietly, the Revolution in Military Affairs (RMA) is transforming all of life, foreign and domestic, into a “battlespace,” including the Earth’s now-ionized (electrified) atmosphere. Wars over natural resources are being replaced by “societal disruptions” as the line that once protected civilian from military is erased. The development of electromagnetic directed energy weapons (DEWs) and “nonlethals” promise “warfare on the cheap” (steerable avoidance of collateral damage), survivability (“Can see everything, anything you can see you can kill”), and effectiveness (“Lethality of precision and volumetric weaponry”).

HAARP technology with its ionizing chemtrails constitutes a global-scale DEW system whose power may have been demonstrated in New York City on September 11, 2001.

Daily, mainstream newscasters wring their hands over “climate change” even as ionospheric heaters torque chemtrails and unnaturally heat the planet for endless biological and chemical warfare “field experiments” entailing aflatoxins, Ebola and Lassa, binary agents, and genomic-targeting pathogens. Nanoparticulates, sensors, and microprocessors pour from the sky and ride into our lungs in a “long-term fingerprintless campaign” while the trumpeted “Worldwide IT Revolution” points toward the grim construction of a C4 world (command, control, communications, and computers), a weapons system of “superb ubiquitous worldwide sensor suites and precision strike capabilities.” Silicon, molecular, quantum, bio, optical communications and computing are moving humanity toward “Automatics / Robotics ‘in the large’/better than human AI/Cyber life,” immersive multisensory VR (virtual reality “holodecks”) in land, sea, air, and space. By circa 2025, “binary bios” (that’s us) will be working in the agriculture and food distribution systems while nanosensors, munitions, and swarm/horde weapons will keep watch over a brave new virtual world peace engirded in a wireless Smart Grid “Cloud” or “space fence.”

Such is our transitional condition in this 67th year of the American National Security State.

The Future Arrives By Stealth

It is instructive to note that the growth of the technocracy (the military-industrial-intelligence complex) corresponds to the accretion of secrets. In 2001, 8.6 million documents were classified, compared with 76.7 million in 2010. As Aviation Week’s senior international defense editor Bill Sweetman put it in his 1993 book Aurora: The Pentagon’s Secret Hypersonic Spyplane: “Cover and covert are the principal words in the secret world’s vocabulary . . . Lifting the cover on intelligence systems reduces their value.”

The aerosol program going on in the sky remains secret because the atmosphere must be kept in an ever-ready plasma “battery” state, and keeping it so is worth collateral damage to all life forms on planet Earth. And so we are monitored and mapped as global power brokers derive yet more wealth from our breakdown due to the ionized aerosols loaded with biological and chemical agents.

How did Americans let this happen? Peacetime representative government didn't stand a chance against the long militarized Cold War armed with the National Security Act of 1947 and the Inventions Secrecy Act of 1951. Americans accepted the necessity for containment of secrets, compartmentalization and need-to-know clearances, but they knew nothing of the cabals, dynastic corporations, and crime syndicates—true experts in secrecy and deception, mayhem and murder—infiltrating one branch after another of the republic's government.

Next, Cold War PhDs led by Austrian-American public relations consultant Edward Louis Bernays (1891-1995) and German-American psychologist Kurt Zadek Lewin (1890-1947) set to work designing a system of information overload and cognitive dissonance that would further desensitize Americans. Like Propaganda Minister Joseph Goebbels in Nazi Germany, they knew that if a lie could be maintained for one generation, the next generation would be easy pickings, particularly if it was echoed in textbooks, TV cartoons and programs. Confuse one generation and the next will ingest the pabulum prepared for them and call it true.

Newspapers, magazines, television networks, and Hollywood deluged Americans with bad news and uncertainty in tiny contextless “news bytes” bolstered by one inane distraction and convenience commodity after another. Canned news, disjointed factoids, docudrama programs like the History and Discovery Channels, memes, subliminal suggestions all worked as a rapid-fire sensory overload that weakened common sense, cognitive capability, and inevitably the social order itself. First Amendment freedom was turned back upon the people it had been written to serve. Now, people can scarcely perceive or interpret what is going on right before their eyes.

Our defense must begin with learning how to read between the lines and behind the scenes of mainstream media smoke and mirrors. Lay researchers with no tenure to protect nor fact to hide may be our only hope. Much can be found in open source, if we but resurrect the capability to contextualize what we find. Waiting for NASA or university labs and their phalanxes of “experts” to tell us what is really going on in our skies is folly. Nor should we depend upon whistleblowers to brave treason or death. It is time to concentrate on working together to discern true from false, information from disinformation—a truly democratic process.

Which brings us to the present battle to expose the secret upon which the survival of biological life on Earth and possibly humanity itself hinges. One layer after another of disinformation and misinformation must be peeled back. The plethora of media terms (geoengineering, global warming, extreme weather, climate change versus anti-climate change, etc.) must be examined. The Internet has played a pivotal role in connecting these dots, not to mention thousands of researchers and activists, in a veritable college course dedicated to retroengineering the truth that the military has disallowed the public.

In fact, the chemtrails-HAARP technology arrived just as the public was finally given access to computers and the Internet in the 1990s . . .

The Internet and Chemtrails

By the mid-1990s, jets were laying heavy trails in the sky that seemed to be making people violently ill. At the same time, the rapid, open source Internet was spewing out news, facts, figures, analyses, and a combination of truth and fiction that came to be known as disinformation . Internet researchers strove to learn this new psyop language while looking up to study the strange behavior of “persistent contrails” that lingered and dispersed into what NASA Langley Research Center scientists had already coined cirrus contrailus. A meme utilized by the U.S. Air Force Academy flamed over the global Internet: chemtrails.

In 1995, the book Angels Don’t Play This HAARP by Dr. Nick Begich and Jeane Manning came out. “Insiders,” “anonymous sources,” and whistleblowers began slipping out of the shadows. Were they legitimate whistleblowers, or disinformation agents? Kevin Barrett, PhD, offers insight into the problem confronting researchers:

The main way that covert operators keep secrets is not by keeping them, but by revealing them—through a discredited source. For example, young George W. Bush’s cocaine arrest, which got him thrown out of the National Guard, was revealed (in an operation orchestrated by Karl Rove) to a journalist named Jim Hatfield. Rove, Bush’s minister, and others confirmed the story to Hatfield. Then when Hatfield revealed the coke bust in his book Fortunate Son, Rove in turn revealed that Hatfield was an ex-con with a conspiracy-to-murder conviction. Sixty Minutes did a hatchet job on Hatfield, and all copies of the book were burned by the publisher. From then on, no respectable journalistic outlet would go near the Bush cocaine arrest story.

Angels co-author Manning was approached by “Mr. X” whose revelations about Pentagon “maniacs” and Bernard J. Eastlund’s HAARP patents led directly to Manning and Begich researching what was behind the HAARP installation then going up in Gakona, Alaska and writing Angels.

In 2001, investigative reporter Will Thomas encountered “Deep Sky,” a senior air traffic control manager for the northeastern seaboard of the United States who in three taped interviews with Thomas and veteran radio journalist S.T. Brendt insisted that “he had been ordered to divert incoming commercial flights away from USAF tankers spraying a substance that showed up on ATC radars as a ‘haze.’”

In 2003, independent scientist and Morgellons researcher Clifford E. Carnicom encountered an anonymous “well-placed military source” whose insights into the biological aspect of chemtrails aerosol operations were for the most part credible:

1. The [aerosol] operation is a joint project between the Pentagon and the pharmaceutical industry.

2. The Pentagon wishes to test biological diseases for war purposes on unsuspecting populations. It was stated that SARS [severe acute respiratory syndrome] is a failure as the expected rate of mortality was intended to be 80%.
3. The pharmaceutical industry is making trillions on medications designed to treat both fatal and non-fatal diseases.
4. The bacteria and viruses are freeze-dried and then placed on fine filaments for release.
5. The metals released along with the diseases heat up from the sun, creating a perfect environment for the bacteria and viruses to thrive in the air supply.
6. Most countries being sprayed are unaware of the activities and they have not consented to the activities. He states that commercial aircraft flying are one of the delivery systems.
7. Most of the “players” are old friends and business partners of the senior Bush [George H.W. Bush].
8. The ultimate goal is the control of all populations through directed and accurate spraying of drugs, diseases, etc.
9. People who have tried to reveal the truth have been imprisoned and killed.
10. His final words: “This is the most dangerous and dark time that I have experienced in all of my years of serving this country.”

The following year, “Deep Shield” surfaced to stir the Internet pot, claiming that he worked with “chiefs and levels above the worker.” Borrowing heavily from the National Academy of Sciences’ 1992 Policy Implications of Greenhouse Warming: Mitigation, Adaptation, and the Science Base, Deep Shield’s revelations read chapter and verse like much of the conspiracy-spun pabulum that dominated the first few years of the Internet. However, his insistence that chemtrails were a Star Wars “shield” out of the Strategic Defense Initiative (SDI) was interesting. Our planet was dying, he said, and public secrecy was to keep people from panicking. Defending against UV poisoning meant that the U.S., Russia, and NATO were working together in chemical production and distribution, but because the “shield” had to be maintained for the sake of the entire planet, “nonparticipant nations” were being sprayed, too. In fact, not spraying was considered a military offense. He agreed that the tons of heavy metals and polymers being sprayed were making people sick, but insisted that “without spraying, we have a 90%+ chance of becoming extinct as a species within the next 20 years.” Deep Shield never mentioned HAARP. After spinning his Internet tales, he dropped from sight with a suicide story in his wake.

Researchers soon realized that they had to be more savvy than the 8th grade level media aimed at. Coaxing a straight answer from news sources, given mainstream media’s penchant for twisting accounts into pretzels in order to step around the truth, was daunting. For example, Daily Comet reporter Xerxes A. Wilson’s 2012 article about the tremors in Lafourche and Terrebonne parishes, Louisiana, land of Big Oil fracking, collapsing salt domes and sinkholes. Wilson employed descriptors like “vibration,” “rumble,” “shake,” “loud noise similar to thunder,” “sounding like a garbage truck had just dropped a dumpster,” and “more tremors,” but avoided discussing what might have actually caused the tremors, choosing to reference only hearsay regarding a connection between tremors and sinkhole. Did he adjust his account to please Big Oil?

In The Guardian, “Lay Scientist” Martin Robbins bemoans media’s “opaque references to ‘experts’ and ‘scientists’ who ‘say’ or ‘claim’ things,” all the while referring to individual experts and bits of research to “imply consensus where none exists,” the sum of journalistic reporting adding up to “approximately jack shit”:

... newspapers train their readers to view science as a homogeneous community of ‘them’ ... Stories based on single studies or experts are not unlikely to be wrong, and over-reliance on stock phrases like ‘scientists say’ suggests the writer hasn’t grasped the wider picture. In the world of science, context is king – we need more of it.

And then there are ”sky sightings” like those between Raton, New Mexico and Colorado Springs, Colorado and Liberal, Kansas on summer solstice 2012; and six months later, on the last day of 2012, when hundreds of in-flight starlings simultaneously dropped dead southeast of Knoxville, Tennessee ; and then why aircraft battling blazes were grounded after a heavy tanker making a slurry run spotted a “meteor.” Where’s the context, follow-up, search for patterns? No one’s talking.

By 1999, approximately 160 websites were busy unlocking the secret in the sky, furiously tracking down bits and pieces of evidence scattered everywhere like Osiris’ body: rain, soil, and saliva collections and observations, analyses of Doppler maps, patents, scientific papers, military studies, etc. How exactly were the dying trees, alkalinized soil, Morgellons lesions sprouting alien fibers, soaring statistics of autism, allergies, and Alzheimer’s connected? Separate the data from disinformation, then retrofit what you can from open source documents, the silver lining for sifting through hundreds of accounts and papers being that you notice you are learning to think in ways that are different from the thinking that created the problem in the first place.

There Be Dragons In Words

Speaking out in the land of liberty about issues that the military and its giant defense contractors consider “national security” is risky. Gulf War veterans attempting to expose the secret of depleted uranium (DU) weapons were targeted. Activists at the 2002 Judi Bari Earthfirst! trial were targeted with microwave weapons (“nonlethals”) in the courtroom and forced to wear leather coats with shiny CD discs on them to deflect the microwaves. Whistleblower scientists who insist upon anonymity do so because many who have broken with their “blood oath” confidentiality agreements have died strange deaths. Manhattan Project scientist Fred Wood, PhD, who helped to develop radar during World War Two, has been targeted for his work on alternative cheap energy and forced to shield himself at night.

Dr. Wood's plight points us toward the scientific research level, where scientists "not formally tied to" defense patrons are rewarded with glorious careers, and scientists of conscience are either marginalized or silenced for good. A decade ago, the international weekly New Scientist complained that the National Academy of Sciences (NAS) and the Pentagon's Joint Non-Lethal Weapons Program (JNLWP) refused to release dozens of reports on non-lethal weapons:

The Academy is justifying its unprecedented reticence by citing security concerns after 11 September. But campaigners think the real reason is that the research violates both U.S. law and international treaties on chemical and biological weapons . . . In 2000, New Scientist revealed that senior officials in the JNLWP want to rewrite the chemical and biological weapons treaties to give themselves more freedom to develop non-lethal weapons. The reports make it clear that research that violates the treaties has been underway since the 1990s.

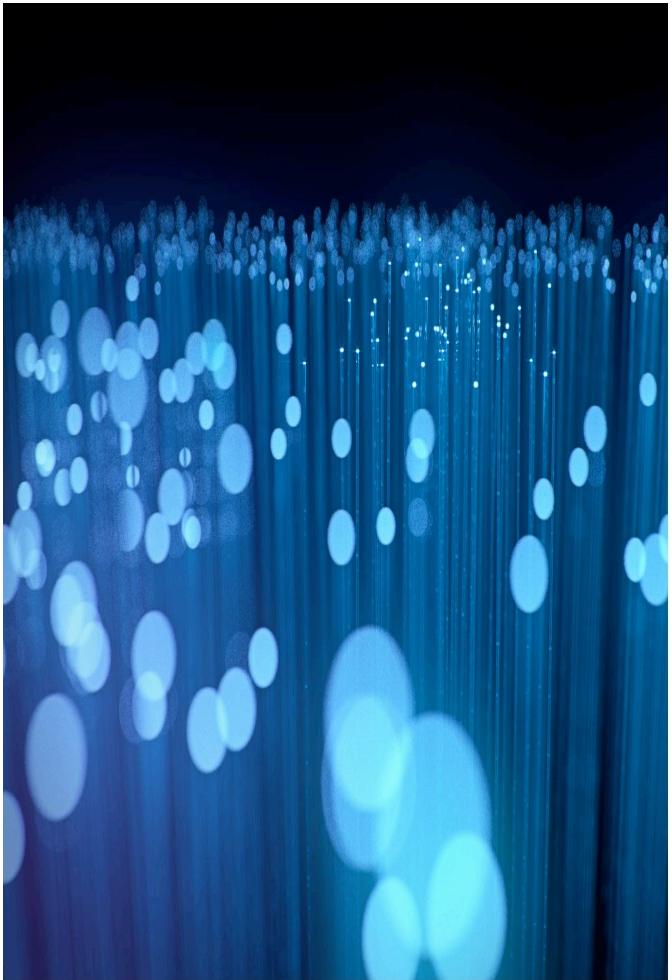

Politicians are no safer. On August 9, 2010, an airplane owned by the telecom General Communications Inc.

mysteriously crashed in Southwest Alaska (500 miles west of the Gakona HAARP installation). Onboard were former Senator Ted Stevens (R-AK, 1968-2009), chairman of the powerful Senate Appropriations Committee; former NASA Administrator Sean O'Keefe; and attorney William D. Phillips Sr. Had Stevens awakened to the fact that HAARP was about much more than ending fossil fuel dependence? Had he enlisted O'Keefe and Steens, who specialized in energy and national defense, for a "fishing trip" of another order? Of the three, only O'Keefe survived. Pilot Terry Smith, who also lost his life, had a family history of "intracerebral hemorrhage." Was Smith remotely targeted to crash the plane?

Retribution is particularly vicious when it comes to the military's own. On New Year's Eve that same year, another insider—John P. Wheeler III, 66, West Point, Harvard, Yale—was brutally murdered after threatening to expose the U.S. military's test of the poison gas Phosgene that killed hundreds of thousands of animals in Arkansas. From 2005 to 2008, Wheeler was Special Assistant to the Secretary of the Air Force, then Special Assistant to the Acting Assistant Secretary of the Air Force for Installations, Logistics and Environment. He then worked as a consultant for MITRE Corporation, producer of the first draft of HAARP's Environmental Impact Statement, which bypassed Congressional scrutiny and was instead announced in the Federal Registry.

Researchers now understand that multiple industries are bound up with the chemtrails-HAARP technology. Given our upside-down "disaster capitalism" world, whereby government and industry profit from creating disasters and running biological field experiments on whoever wherever, this should be no surprise. For example, the Nuclear Regulatory Commission's Atomic Safety and Licensing Board's approved Southern California Edison's plan to continue operating the collapsing San Onofre nuclear power plant to "see what happens"; the New York Police Department ("working with Long Island's Brookhaven National Laboratory") released perflu-oroxygen gases into the subway system during morning rush hour “to study how chemical weapons could be dispersed through the air”; and Louis Slesin of Microwave News discovered that the White House Office of Policy Development had removed a key paragraph of a two-year Environmental Protection Agency (EPA) study, namely the recommendation that ELF fields be classified as “probable human carcinogens.”

The telecommunications industry is practically a synonym for military, cell towers and fiber optics cables being essential to the C4 Smart Grid system and “battery” atmosphere. Thus, it’s not hard to guess how New York attorney Andrew Campanelli might have attracted the wrong kind of attention, given that he advises city councils about how to write protective telecom ordinances and file lawsuits to stop cell phone towers. One summer day, his new office landlords turned off the air conditioning and stairwell lighting, after which the elevator cable snapped, leaving him suspended between floors. When he tried to use the elevator phone, he was cut off even as he smelled smoke. By the time the firefighters arrived, he’d crawled out onto a chest-high floor. A warning?

The GMO (genetically modified organisms) food/chemical industry profits from chemtrails-HAARP technology. Monsanto was the first to produce an aluminum-resistant “terminator seed” as jets were spreading conductive aluminum hazes over NATO nations. The prominent German newspaper Suddeutsche Zeitung reports that individuals and groups opposed to GMOs and the glyphosate in Monsanto’s Roundup herbicide have been threatened, hacked, slandered, and terrorized. Monsanto has ties to U.S. intelligence, the military, and private security companies, and former Monsanto executives hold scores of key government positions. In 2013, Monsanto purchased Climate Corporation, a farmer insurance underwriter, for $1 billion.

Strange deaths also stalk NASA employees. Paul Milford Muller, 76, co-navigator on the Apollo Navigation Team, was found in Thailand in May 2013 with a rope around his neck and genitals, plus drug paraphernalia nearby. He had worked at NASA’s Jet Propulsion Laboratory at the California Institute of Technology. Seven years earlier, former NASA astronaut Charles E. Brady, Jr., MD, 54, was found dead by knife wounds on Orcas Island, Washington. When chosen as an astronaut, Dr. Brady had been serving in the U.S. Navy’s Tactical Electronic Warfare Squadron 129. After spending 16 days, 21 hours, 48 minutes and 30 seconds 173 miles in space on space shuttle Columbia (STS-78), he wrote:

You almost feel guilty being up there. The oceans were so blue, they were almost phosphorescent. The landmasses were something like you’d dream of as a child. The earth is a magnificent place, and it does look perfect from space. At the same time, we saw evidence of rain forest destruction and damaged river systems. It makes you come back feeling very deeply that you want to protect the earth.

He added that he was totally unprepared for the almost corporeal transformation that takes place in space: “It is as if God suddenly made you into a dolphin. It is a mystery that is billions and trillions of times deeper than I had ever imagined."

How different from the military mindset that has loosed chemtrails-HAARP technology upon Planet Earth.

Whoever we decide to blame—military personnel, weather forecasters, civil air traffic controllers, pilots, environmental agencies and associations, senators, representatives, physicians, scientists, media—it is certain that they are embedded in a conspiracy of silence. Still, their silence does not belie the fact that they are guilty of denial of service and breach of duty to inform and protect the public.

So when the California Air Resources Board claims to have no air quality records for 2002-2011 but finally begrudgingly hands them over and you can tell that the data has been reworked , just remember these heartening words from Robert Shetterly's "The Necessary Embrace of Conspiracy":

Con + spirare, from the Latin. To breathe together. Those are the roots of conspiracy. Breathing together doesn't sound like an activity of the ideologically deracinated whispering seditiously in a dank cellar or a board room, foul breaths dentingown demise. a weak flame flickering over a candle nub, gunpowder or greed blackened fingers setting a timer, the whites of creased eyes glinting like knives with treason, murder, power, and deceit.

Con + spirare sounds like healthy men and women standing in the sun figuring out how in the hell they are going to take care of each other and their aging mother Earth and love life while doing it. Breathing together, sharing the same air, plotting to make sure that what's mine is yours, conspiring to save their self-respect, their ideals, the future for their children.

I want to be part of a conspiracy. Pervasive, populist, revolutionary, and totally transparent. Grassroots. Idealistic. Simplistic. Life-affirming. Community building.

A conspiracy to make the common good and the love of nature the common denominator of every economic transaction.

And the simple truth is either we start breathing together, conspiring big time, right out in the open, nakedly, unashamedly, or we will have conspired in secret, by default, in our We have let them breathe for us, and they have stolen our the whites of creased eyes glinting like knives with breath, our air, our spirit.

Secret con + spirare is death. Open con + spirare is life.

Conspiracy is dead. Long live conspiracy!

About Elana Freeland

Over the years, Elana Freeland has been a Rudolf Steiner school pioneer, teacher, lecturer, storyteller, and writer. She has written for alternative publications, edited the stories of survivors of MK-ULTRA and ritual abuse, and is still ghost-writing books on diverse topics. During her undergraduate days, her second major was biology. In 1996, she was awarded a Master of Arts in Great Books and honors for her thesis on historiography at St. John's College in Santa Fe, New Mexico.

In June 2014, Feral House Books released Chemtrails, HAARP, and the Full Spectrum Dominance of Planet Earth. Recently, the Australian magazine Nexus published her article on invasive electromagnetic weapons. Freeland is also the author of a fictional American history series called Sub Rosa America about the “deep politics” behind the downfall of the United States since John F. Kennedy’s assassination. She has now begun the sequel to Chemtrails, HAARP, and the Full Spectrum Dominance of Planet Earth, which will be about the next phase of the global chemtrails-ionospheric heater technology: the “space fence,” a world Smart Grid enabled by the ionized atmosphere we now breathe. Inside the space fence lockdown, humanity is to be neurologically herded toward a Transhumanist future. Freeland now lives in Olympia, Washington.

THE TRIUMPH OF ALEISTER CROWLEY

by Paul Roberts

On December 1, 1947, The Great Beast, Aleister Crowley died of chronic bronchitis aggravated by pleurisy and myocardial degeneration, at the age of 72. His funeral was held at on December 5; about a dozen people attended. An inauspicious end to a man who believed he was chosen to usher in the Aeon of Horus, a new era in which humans would take control of their destiny. The man who was audacious and brash enough to call himself the Beast died quietly and without fanfare; a failure it would seem.

It is perhaps Crowley's final joke that the infiltration of his philosophy happened so quietly and subtly...and totally.

The Beast

Crowley called himself the "The Beast." That is a bold name to attach to oneself. There are two Beasts mentioned in the Book of Revelation. The Beast from the Sea is the one that everyone seems to focus on: the Antichrist. However, the Beast from the Earth precedes the Antichrist. This Beast heralds the Antichrist. He prepares the way for him. He is his John the Baptist; the anti-John the Baptist; the False Prophet. For the Antichrist will mimic the story of Jesus. He will pattern his rise on Jesus' life. Right down to an apparent death and resurrection after three days.

"But Aleister Crowley died in 1947," you might say. "Where is the Antichrist?" Clearly, Crowley could not really have been the Beast since it has been years and the Antichrist has not appeared. Even Crowley seemed puzzled at the end of his life. His final words are reported to have been, "I am perplexed."

We, human beings tend to look at time in a very linear and myopic way. We think in terms of months and years; a decade is an eternity. The spirit realm is not linear however. The Bible is riddled with reminders of how God does not work on our time, but on his own. In addition, people expect grandiosity and ostentation. Something Crowley was all to pleased to provide. If he was the False Prophet it would have been be obvious right? Evil is ugly, and easy to identify, right?

C.S. Lewis, in The Screwtape Letters describes evil differently. "It does not matter how small the sins are provided that their cumulative effect is to edge the man away from the Light and out into the Nothing. Murder is no better than cards if cards can do the trick. Indeed the safest road to Hell is the gradual one--the gentle slope, soft underfoot, without sudden turnings, without milestones, without signposts."

"...to edge the man away from the Light..." A world that is ready for the Antichrist is a world that has edged away from the light. A world whose attention has been directed somewhere else. Revelation 13:12 King James Version (KJV) proclaims "And he exerciseth all the power of the first beast before him, and causeth the earth and them which dwell therein to worship the first beast..." The False Prophet prepares the world to worship the Antichrist.

A world prepared to worship the Antichrist may not look the way we expect it to though. Evil seldom does.

Do As Thou Wilt

In 1904, Aleister Crowley published the Liber AL vel Legis, The Book of the Law, in which he proclaimed "Do what though wilt shall be the whole of the law." Sounds impressive. Sounds epic. Take away the thous and the wilts and what does it leave us? "Do what you want shall be the law." Sound familiar? It is taught every day in school; it is in our songs; it's in our films; it is all-pervasive. "Everyone gets to decide what is right for them." "Do what makes you happy as long as you don't hurt anyone." It is the American ideal. The ability to forge your own path; be your own master. It is called Secular Humanism, New Ageism, modern morality -- The idea that there is no external, objective morality. You decide what is right for you. It sounds great. It sounds right. And that is the key. The False Prophet will sound right. His arguments will be subtle, convincing, and appealing. His deadly appeal will lie in the fact that what he says will sound so right, so sensible, so exactly what we have always wanted to hear. This "new religion" of the False Prophet will be appealing and palatable. Crowley's Thelema revolves around the idea that human beings each have their own True Will that they should discover and pursue. Sounds right too, huh? It sounds right because you have been fed a steady diet of it your whole life -- In school, in the media, especially in music. Because where do the youth go for wisdom?

And he will control the media

Most people know about Jimmy Paige and Led Zeppelin's fascination with Crowley. "Do What Thou Wilt" was inscribed on the vinyl of Led Zeppelin's album Led Zeppelin

III. Paige bought Crowley's Scottish estate, Boleskine House. Crowley was included as one of the figures on the cover art of The Beatles' album Sgt. Pepper's Lonely Hearts Club Band. John Lennon, in an interview with Playboy magazine said, "The whole Beatle idea was to do what you want, right? To take your own responsibility, do what you want and try not to harm other people, right? DO WHAT THOU WILST, as long as it doesn't hurt somebody..." David Bowie made reference to Crowley in the lyrics of his song "Quicksand" Ozzy Osbourne and his lyricist Bob Daisley wrote a song titled "Mr. Crowley." The list goes on. Sting has discussed his fascination with Crowley. But, we might dismiss this as 60s and 70s experimentation and our kids don't really listen to this stuff anyway so whatever... But we listened to it.

What about today's chart toppers? Jay-Z, has repeatedly appropriated imagery and quotations from Crowley's work. Whether wearing a T-shirt emblazoned with 'Do what thou wilt' or hiring Rihanna to hold aloft a flaming torch in his music videos (a reference to the belief that Lucifer is the 'light bringer'). Jay-Z's clothing line, Rocawear, is crawling with Thelema imagery such as the 'all seeing eye' in a triangle, the 'eye of Horus' and the head of Baphomet.

How could we forget Madonna's 2012 Luciferian ritualistic performance at Super Bowl XLVIII? Madonna paraded her ceremonial garb around Masonic signs, all-seeing-eyes, pentagrams, and pyramids, all while gesturing Baphomet and Illuminati symbols. She evoked Satan in her performance by sliding through a human pyramid like a snake as the audience held up light sticks, again, a salute to Lucifer, the light bringer.

A week before the Superbowl, Madonna spoke with Anderson Cooper on the spiritual importance she attributed to her halftime show: "The Super Bowl is kind of like the Holy of Holies in America. I'll come at halfway of the "church experience" and I'm gonna have to deliver a sermon." Isn't it precious that Madonna writes Kabbalah themed children's books, introducing countless children to magick and the occult, disguised as valuable life lessons?

Katy Perry's 2014 Grammy performance included a Knights Templar cross emblazoned across her chest, a beast with Moloch horns, dancers in dark robes with devil horns protruding from their heads, and pole dancing with a broom concluding with Perry being burned at the stake. Was Perry actually kidding when she said she "sold my soul to the devil" during a television interview a few years ago?

We have been fed a steady diet of magick and "Do as thou wilt" since we were children. We have in turn fed our children a steady diet of the same. It appears to have worked quite well too. We are in the midst of a Narcissism Epidemic conclude psychologists Jean M. Twenge and W. Keith Campbell in their 2009 book. One study they describe showed that among a group of 37,000 college students, narcissistic personality traits rose just as quickly as obesity from the 1980s to the present. Evidence for the rise in narcissism continues to come up in research and news. A study by psychologist Dr. Nathan DeWall and his team found "a statistically significant trend toward narcissism and hostility in popular music."

Consider the number of “leaked” celebrity nude selfies that have been in the news of late. A terrible invasion of privacy to be sure, but when did everyone start taking so many naked photos of themselves. What is going on there? Leaked sex tapes, selfies, Facebook, Twitter, and on and on – we are slaves to self worship.

I world prepared for the Antichrist is a world that believes that “the pursuit of happiness” is the meaning of life. A world that believes that fulfilling our own desires on our own terms is good and right. Where narcissism is encouraged and fostered. Where the self is the ultimate arbiter of truth. A world prepared for the Antichrist will look a lot like the one we live in.

Do what thou wilt shall be the whole of the law. It sounds like a proclamation. I believe Crowley meant it as prophecy. The key is SHALL. Do what thou wilt SHALL be the whole of the law. SHALL BE. He wrote that in 1904. It know longer SHALL BE, it IS.

When he Antichrist does appear his words will reinforce these “truths”. He will tell us what we already believe to be true. “Organized religion is evil and has caused wars for thousands of years. Religious people are bigots and ignorant dupes. We have evolved to the point that these superstitions are not necessary. Claiming an objective truth is arrogant and myopic. Everyone’s beliefs are valid. We should have a religion hat affirms everyone and is based on love and peace. YOU should decide what is right for you.” “Imagine all the people...” It sounds right. Sounds like the utopia we have come to yearn for. And it is an offer we have been primed to accept.

The Stories of Our Lives: How Today's Ideas Will Become Tomorrow's Viral Mythology

By Marie D. Jones and Larry Flaxman

Citizens of the nation: I shall not try to conceal the gravity of the situation that confronts the country, nor the concern of your government in protecting the lives and property of its people...we must continue the performance of our duties each and every one of us, so that we may confront this destructive adversary with a nation united, courageous, and consecrated to the preservation of human supremacy on this earth....

—From Mercury Theatre on Air, War of the Worlds, 1938

On Sunday, October 30, at 8 p.m., something happened that would send people all over the country into a panic. The year was 1938, and a radio broadcast came over the airwaves that would shock its listeners into running for the hills—well, those who weren't able to tune in from the start and here Orson Welles say that he, on behalf of the Mercury Theatre on the Air, was about to present War of the Worlds by H.G. Wells, for their listening pleasure. The broadcast was done in a serious tone, with intense music and official sounding news bulletins. But many listeners tuned in a bit later, when Welles was past the introduction and deep into Wells' story of a Martian invasion on U.S. shores—and took it seriously.

Nuttiness ensued.

Thousands of people called into their local radio stations, police stations, and newspaper offices. Many people in the New England area actually loaded up their cars with kids and a few goods they could grab, and fled the region. People flocked into local churches to pray and await imminent death. There were alleged reports of people having heart attacks, miscarriages, and early births. The panic was widespread as more and more people became hysterical, thinking the Martian invasion was real.

Once word got out that it wasn't real, and was just a pre-Halloween radio show meant to entertain, people became outraged and threatened to sue the program, and many people expressed their anger at Orson Welles for causing the panic. But what had really happened was something that happens all the time: People got a piece of information, made an assumption before getting all the information, and reacted accordingly.

Mob rule. Hysteria. Riots in the streets. Contagious panic. Collective fear.

As popular singer Adele might have sang during the chaos, "Rumor Has It...."

Cut to 2013 and all over the Internet, across social networking sites like Facebook and Twitter, the story is spreading like wildfire of an actual angel dressed in priestly clothing that turned up out of thin air at a terrible auto accident, and blessed the victims before helping rescue workers. Then he vanished into thin air, just the way he arrived. Everyone was flummoxed. Who was this mystery priest—this unidentified angel? The word angel, in fact, was everywhere, even before people took a breath long enough to wait for the real story to emerge.

There really was a real priest there at the scene. He just didn't want a lot of fuss made over his actions. His name was Reverend Patrick Dowling, from the Diocese of Jefferson County, Missouri, and he just did what God would have expected of him: He absolved and anointed the victim, 19-year-old Katie Lentz, and then got out of the way to let rescuers do their job. Simple.

Just a few months before that, it seemed the entire nation was waiting breathlessly, anxiety mounting, collectively frenzied as social net-work sites BLEW UP with news of its coming—waiting and waiting, posting and waiting—until finally the moment came, when the SyFy Channel aired the premiere of Sharknado, starring Tara Reid and Ian Ziering, and a host of other less-than-B-list stars. The 90-minute movie was awful, to say the least, but it didn't matter, because so many people tuned in that a sequel was ordered immediately.

But it wasn't the movie that is important here. It did, indeed, suck so badly, it would have scored a negative 10 on the list of the 10 worst films ever made. What was so utterly stunning to watch was the absolutely insane hype that spread like wildfire over Twitter and Facebook—any marketing firm's dream—causing record-breaking numbers of posts that some say should have been reserved for major world events, like assassinations of presidents and terrorist attacks. Though it is highly doubtful that the next Sharknado will have that same effect, now that the novelty has worn off. But why?

Why did so many people buy into the viral spread of this ridiculous campy motion picture?

Going Viral

In the case of viral ideas, there may indeed be reasons why certain ones thrive, while others can barely survive.

When Malcolm Gladwell's highly influential The Tipping Point (see Chapter 1) set the marketing world on fire, talking of the importance of "influencers" as the responsible parties for the contagious spread of ideas and innovations, he may have left a big chunk out of the viral equation. A newer book, published in 2012, called

Everything Is Obvious: How Common Sense Fails Us by Duncan J. Watts, a professor of sociology at Columbia University, posits that influencers are not anywhere near as important as the receivers, the audience, and for an idea to go viral, that audience, especially when it comes to social networking, has to be enthusiastic or approving of the idea presented. And, he argues, rarely does common sense enter the picture.

Watts found that although influencers are one end of the yard-stick—and are indeed responsible for igniting the match that sets an idea viral and makes it contagious—what allows it to spread like wild-fire is the receptivity of the people who then post, tag, spread, share, and endorse. If they collectively do not respond, the idea could hit a wall.

So whereas Watts, in his research, does admit that highly influential people are more likely to trigger a social epidemic, it's the receptors that make or break it, and the more easily influenced those receptors are, the wider the idea spreads. Often, subject matter, timing, and the topic of the idea or innovation counts as much, too, as an idea may go viral, but again may hit a wall at some point if the subject isn't one that has widespread appeal and the ability to evoke collective enthusiasm (or repulsion, as what goes viral isn't always positive; just see the spider bite posts on Facebook to know what we mean!).

So, why do some ideas take on a viral quality and others fall by the wayside?

It may be all in the presentation, and the power of persuasion. Say you are a vacuum cleaner salesman. You go door to door, trying to sell your product by telling people all its good qualities and how this hose is better than the old hose, and the floor settings contain two new ones over last year's model, and look—it comes in green, too. You sell one or two if you're lucky. Your colleague goes door to door and instead asks if their cat has ever emptied its food bowl onto the carpeting, or if the lady of the house has ever dropped coffee grounds on the floor, and then sets out to "solve a problem" by telling all the reasons why the vacuum can make the customer's life so much better. He or she sells 10 in one day.

One tries to sell on common sense, the other on emotional and personal impact.

Getting Contagious

According to Jonah Berger, assistant professor of marketing at Wharton School of Business, there are specific ways to make an idea or any kind of content or information viral, and the secret is in getting contagious. In a research paper he wrote with Katy Milkman called "What Makes Online Content Go Viral?" Berger came up with the following:

1. Positive content is more viral than negative content. Yes, even in today's environment of "if it bleeds, it leads," we tend to spread further those things that make us feel better.
2. Content that evokes any high arousal emotion is more viral than content without emotion. If it makes you feel something, whether fear, anger, or joy, and feel it strongly, you are more likely to respond, repost, re-tweet, and repeat.

3. Practical and useful content gets shared. If it is something that someone needs to do something better, easier, cheaper, more fun, or more efficiently, it goes viral more often.

Content, therefore, is not always "king" unless it meets the parameters by which it can be shared with larger groups of people, over wider networks. Certainly, our ancient ancestors shared with each other, and through time, with us, what was important to them, whether because they found it useful, it evoked emotion, or made them feel better. Or, they passed down what they were persuaded to by someone who could talk up a good storm full of passion and emotion and reasons why they had the information that counted.

We pass on certain pieces of information, and ignore others we deem not important or fit to spread around. We might even do this because of our brains.

A recent neuroscience study set out to prove why some ideas go viral and others fall by the wayside. What is it, the researchers asked, that makes an idea—which is, remember, information—buzz worthy? In the study, as documented in a Forbes article titled “Your Brain on Buzz: Why Some Ideas Go Viral and Others Go Nowhere” (July 6, 2013), a group of UCLA students were presented with 20 or so ideas for a potential television show while hooked up to an fMRI brain imaging machine. They were asked to pretend they were interns and evaluate the ideas to pitch to TV producers. Another larger group of students were told that they were the TV producers and watched the same videos of potential show ideas as the first group, then make their evaluations of which ideas were best.

The idea was to see any differences in the brains of those “interns” who most effectively pitched the ideas and those who were not as successful in getting the “producers” to buy the ideas. The scans of the brains showed indeed that the interns who enthusiastically pitched and were the most persuasive had significantly more activity in the temporoparietal junction when they chose their favorite ideas than those who were not successful and enthusiastic about their ideas. This difference in activity was labeled the “salesperson effect” and showed that once a “buzz-worthy” idea hits the brain, a sort of “buzz alarm” goes off and tells the person that this particular idea or piece of information is one worth spreading to others.

The only thing that has changed through time is the amount of opportunities we have to go viral, with today’s technology, via texting, e-mailing, social networking, radio shows, television, motion pictures, books, magazines, and so forth. But the reasons some ideas survive may always be a part of human nature that doesn’t change over time. Get them in the gut.

Bad Information

Misinformation, which is just false information that gets spread by accident or lack of oversight, is everywhere. People take something that has not been sourced or proven true, and they spread it, and nobody along the way takes the time to check into the validity, until someone does finally question the viral wave and stop it in its tracks by looking for the real story. At the same time, we are being exposed to everything from disinformation, which is the purposeful spread of false information often by authority figures, to propaganda from our government, the media, and corporations that want us to think and believe one thing over another for their own motives and agendas. Though talk of conspiracies always leads to many a rolled eye, the thing is, we are not being given all the information all of the time, and we end up passing down to future generations only what we have been told.

But is it true?

MOON DUST

By William B Stoecker

It began with an encounter...an experience resembling in many ways more recent reports of UFO abductions. By itself, my experience is of no real importance; such accounts are very common today, although mine predated even the Barney and Betty Hill case. But it is the aftermath of my experience, the strange and terrible things that happened years later, that is unique. For these events shed light on the true nature of the government conspiracy to cover up the truth about UFOs, and even hint at a sinister connection between the elites who control our government and certain UFO entities.

In the summer of 1955, at the age of 11 years, I attended a school-sponsored summer camp at Garner State Park in the Texas hill country, perhaps about 100 miles west of San Antonio. We boys slept on cots in tents, furnishing our own bedding, in my case a light cotton summer sleeping bag. My tent was perhaps the third or fourth down from the end of a row roughly paralleling the Frio River, and my cot was at the front of the tent. Beyond the last tent was more or less open country, partly wooded, that extended perhaps one or two hundred yards to a fence that extended down to the river; beyond that was more open country, state park land where normally no people would be out and about late at night. I went to sleep as usual one night, and all seemed well...but my life was about to change in ways I couldn't even imagine.

For I found myself standing, barefoot, sleeping bag slung over my shoulder, by the fence. The night was clear and moonless, and I was in a very strange state of consciousness. It was not like a dream state, or being fully awake (assuming that any of us are ever truly awake), nor like being half asleep. I was fully aware of who I was and where I was...but I was completely calm and unafraid, when I should have been terrified. For I was more or less surrounded by a group of "people" whose exact appearance I do not remember, except that they looked human or nearly human. No words were spoken, not even a voice in my head, but I had a strong sense of being questioned or tested in some fashion. Then I found myself walking back toward the area of the tents, and gradually waking up. I looked over my shoulder and saw the fence only a few yards behind me, but I saw no "people," and I was never in a UFO that I remember, nor did I see any kind of craft. The area is full of limestone caves, which may be significant, but I don't recall being in one. I made my way back to my tent, but my path was blocked by a patch of burrs, so I threw my sleeping bag on them, walked on it, picked it up, placed it on my cot, climbed in, and went to sleep. In the morning dirt and burrs partly covered my sleeping bag, proof (at least to my satisfaction) that I had physically left the tent...it had not just been a dream. Perhaps it was a waking dream superimposed on the real landscape and coinciding with sleep walking, but there are many problems with this theory. I told one other boy about my experience, and he suggested that perhaps a group of larger kids had carried me out and left me as a prank, but there are serious problems with this theory as well. I didn't know this boy at home, only at camp, and I am certain that he promptly forgot what I told him. Since I told no one else, there seems to be no way that the government, for example, could have known about my experience. And had it not been for what happened later, I myself would doubt the objective reality of my own experience.

In the years that followed I continued to have strange and seemingly paranormal experiences; such things are more common than most people realize. But that night at summer camp is the only abduction I recall.

In the fall of 1963 I returned to New Mexico State University in Las Cruces (on the mysterious Rio Grande Rift Zone) to begin my junior year as a History major and USAF ROTC cadet. Our little ROTC detachment had a new member, Major Francis Cunnion, wearing an Army paratrooper badge on his USAF uniform. He explained that back in the early nineteen fifties he had joined an elite special ops intelligence unit whose mission, he said, was to parachute onto the site if any Soviet aircraft should happen to crash in North America, in order to gather intelligence. This was just before the JFK assassination, and I still trusted the government, so I believed him. Note that I was at NMSU first, and then he arrived, leaving open the possibility that he was sent there partly because I was there. Of course, at the time, I suspected nothing.

In the fall of 1964, during my senior year, I was sent, along with another cadet, to Holloman Air Force Base in Alamogordo, New Mexico for a pre-commissioning physical. There is nothing strange about that; the two bases closest to Las Cruces were Holloman and Biggs (in El Paso). But remember that for years there have been many strange stories about Holloman, including accounts of UFO landings. I remember clearly the drive to Holloman; Master Sergeant Gragg was driving, and I even remember much of the conversation among the three of us. I remember our driving in the front gate of the base, and Sergeant Gragg making a disparaging remark about the guard, and I remember our driving up a tree-lined street. After that I remember nothing; my next memory is being back at NMSU. Now, there may be nothing at all strange about this...who remembers a routine physical after thirty years (and now it has been over fifty)? But it is strange that I remember everything up to that point, and then nothing.

But I was commissioned as a second lieutenant in June, 1965, and called to active duty in September, eventually becoming a NORAD Intelligence Officer. Under AFR 200-2, UFO investigation was an intelligence function, and so, ironically, I was also a UFO investigator. This regulation was superseded by AFR 80-17, making UFOs an R&D function, but I retained the job as an additional duty. For various reasons that made sense at the time, I decided to leave the service when my time was up, but, still having some lingering faith in our government and not wanting my training, experience, and security clearance to go to waste, I applied by letter for a job as an intelligence analyst with the DIA (Defense Intelligence Agency). They never even replied, yet at this same time they hired another young officer I knew, a fine man, but less qualified than I by training and clearance level for this particular job. This was my first inkling that something a little strange was going on. Worse was to come.

A CIA recruiter arrived in town (I was stationed at a base that no longer exists just outside Duluth, Minnesota). I arranged to meet him and be interviewed. I actually seemed to make a good impression on him, and he told me that of course he couldn't promise anything, but that they had multiple positions to fill and I was highly qualified. A day or two later I received a terse telegram from CIA headquarters in Langley, Virginia, stating that they would not hire me, and giving no reason. Then the recruiter called me and asked why he had not heard back from me...they had not even told their own recruiter. Think about this...as I was forced to do. The recruiter, in a position to size me up personally, would send Langley a list of possible candidates with his recommendations, and then and only then would they decide whom to hire. But in my case, before even getting the full final report from the recruiter, who seemed to feel that I was qualified (else why did he call me back?), someone at Langley felt that I was not for them...they knew, or thought they knew, something about me. They had a file on me, or at least had my name on a list of undesirables. But why? How could they even have heard of me? I was nothing, nobody. For the first time I realized, with a sinking feeling, that somebody up there didn't like me. But I tried not to let this bother me, and I tried to get on with my life.

After wasting a few years in graduate school I took the old civil service test and became a claims representative for the Social Security Administration. It was a stressful job, and I had little patience with the many healthy people who filed for disability claims, and I was reprimanded more than once for "courtesy." On the other hand I was one of the most efficient and productive workers in the office. I transferred in to an office in Sacramento in 1975, and, perhaps a year or two later, a management person (the agency was so top heavy with management people that they literally had to invent titles for them) named Roland Clements transferred in. He was a strange man who read a great deal of science fiction and belonged to Werner Erhard's somewhat sinister "EST" cult. No one trusted him; he was regarded as management's hatchet man.

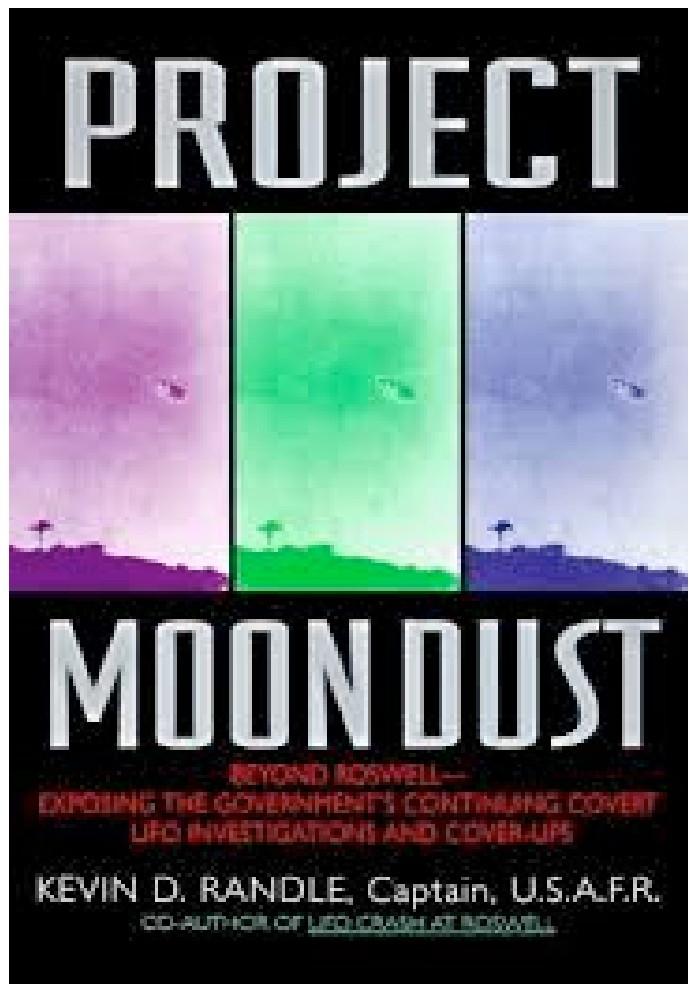

One day, Clements called me; my supervisor, Alex Cedano; and my union representative, Gloria Maness to a meeting. Throwing a thick stack of papers onto the table in front of me, he stated that I had illegally altered applications I had taken, after the clients had signed them, without having them initial the changes as required, and that I would be fired and possibly sent to prison. Yet this, improper as it was, was something almost everyone in the office had done at one time or another, usually for innocent reasons, like correcting a mistake and forgetting to have it initiated. It was immediately apparent that I was being subjected to a double standard, and also that someone had been spending a lot of time and energy trying to get something on me. For the papers were copies of applications I had taken, and, sure enough, every one of them had been illegally altered. But in every case the changes were made in neither mine nor any of the clients' handwriting, and both I and my union representative saw it right away. Some other employee, perhaps Clements himself or someone acting under his direction, had made the changes, and it was so obvious that Clements had to have known it. In other words, he was trying to fire me and railroad me into prison using illegally altered documents. When we pointed this out to him, he merely smirked at us. We appealed, and the agency had to drop the matter. Yet they redoubled their efforts to fire me, and eventually succeeded in 1986.

Shocking as this was, it was merely the first punch. Only weeks later, a friend of mine in the office mentioned to me that Clements had boasted to him of having been a paratrooper in the USAF, a member of an intelligence team trained to parachute onto the site if any Soviet aircraft should happen to crash in North America. In other words, Clements had been in the same unit as Major Cunnion...a unit so small and little known that I have spoken to many former and retired USAF personnel...and not a one of them had ever heard of this unit. I immediately realized that the odds against this being a coincidence were truly astronomical. I had been targeted...and now my experiences with the DIA and CIA made a weird kind of sense. And I realized that a unit trained to parachute onto crashed aircraft would be ideal for parachuting onto crashed UFOs, with the aircraft mission being a perfect cover story. My life had just become the ultimate paranoid nightmare, a cross between a bad spy movie and an equally bad science fiction movie, and I was not even the hero...just a helpless victim. But how could they possibly have known about my abduction experience?

It was several frustrating years before I finally realized that the government didn't have to know about my experience. Abductions seem to run in families, and all the government had to do was track the families of potential abductees and exclude members from certain government positions. Exactly why they would do this is uncertain; perhaps they consider such people as a security risk. Yet I was allowed to become a USAF Intelligence Officer. Why one sensitive position and not another? This is one of several questions I cannot answer. As for the Social Security Administration, keep in mind that this agency has information on virtually everyone in the country, whether they receive social security benefits, or SSI, or are still working and paying into the system. It is perfect as part of a surveillance network.

I tried telling people all of this, but, naturally enough, no one really took me seriously. Then author and researcher Kevin Randle wrote an article in a now-defunct magazine and then a book: Project Moon Dust, Avon Books, 1998. In it he included copies of government documents secured via the Freedom of Information Act, clearly showing that in 1953 the USAF had established a crash retrieval team, not only for aircraft, but also to investigate crashed UFOs. The unit never had more than about 130 officers and men, out of an Air Force that, during the Vietnam War, had about 800,000 personnel. And the US population today is well over 300 million. So, once again, what happened to me is no coincidence. And, a little later, Melinda Leslie and several other women who had never heard of me came forward with accounts of having been abducted by the UFO entities and then actually abducted by the military, and subjected to humiliating tests. Having never heard of me, they could not have been copying my story, and I was telling my story before they told theirs. How could several people, independently, invent the same ridiculous sounding story?

This means that as far back as 1953, the government, which denies the existence of UFOs, believed that they were real, that at least some were physical craft, and that they might crash. And at least as far back as 1963 and probably much earlier, the government was capable of tracking abduction-prone families, and was obsessed with doing so. Beyond this, my experience raises more questions than answers. Ironically, I have always suspected that my experience might be paranormal in nature, but the existence of this unit, and the use of some of its former members to keep an eye on potential abductees, clearly implies a connection between “nuts and bolts” craft and the abduction phenomenon. Perhaps other people will come forward with more pieces for this puzzle...but, until then, the mystery deepens.

By Cheri Seymour

Excerpt: --- “The Soviets froze Ustinov’s blood and body parts and kept the Ustinov Ebola strain alive and replicating in the Biopreparat lab called Vector. They named the strain Variant U, after Ustinov, and mass produced it in simple bio-reactors. They dried Variant U, processed it into an inhalable dust, resembling pink talcum powder, then tested the airborne weapon on animals in special explosion-test chambers. Just one to five microscopic particles of Variant U lodged in the lungs of a monkey was equal in lethality to eight thousand spores of weapons-grade anthrax. Variant U was on the verge of becoming a strategic bio-weapon, ready to be loaded into MIRV warheads, when the Soviet Union fell apart and Russian scientists left to work in other countries.”

NOTE from the author: This article is an updated version originally written in October 2000, but never published until now.

Urgent U.S. defense preparations are underway to cope with the emerging threat of Ebola virus, the most recent of which occurred in West Africa and spread to the United States by volunteer healthcare workers and doctors returning home from the Ebola-infected regions of Sierra Leone, Liberia, and Guinea.

Ebola, commonly known as Hemorrhagic Fever, killed 6,331 people as of December 10, 2014, according to the World Health Organization (WHO), originally set up by the United Nations in 1948 to combat global pandemics such as polio, malaria, tuberculosis, and influenza. The Ebola virus had never been seen in West Africa before December 2013, nevertheless critics argue that WHO should have had a “pandemic preparedness plan” in effect and ready to roll long before the first outbreak in Guinea.

“Nobody knew that this disease called Ebola would be possible in such parts of Africa,” said Dr Isabelle Nuttall to BBC News in October 2014. <http://www.bbc.com/news/world-europe-29691044> Dr. Nuttall is WHO’s Director of Global Capacities, Alert and Response, and should have done her homework on the full history of Ebola in Africa and other areas of the world before she made that statement. Ebola is an infectious disease, not airborne or contagious unless it becomes mutated, and that is the crux of the story.

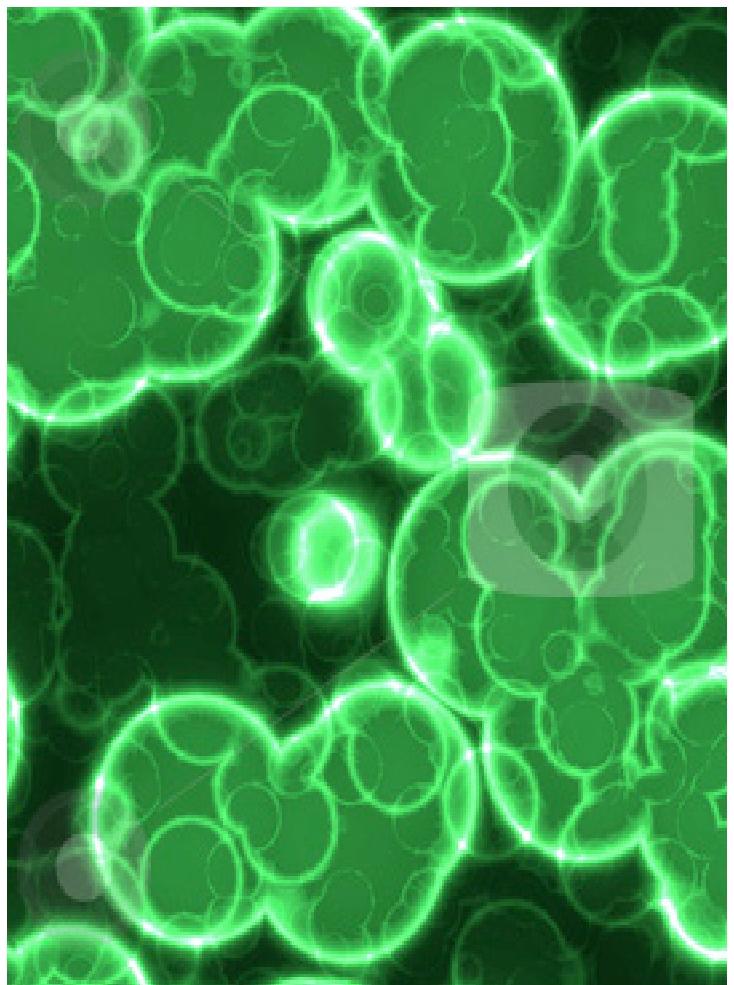

CNN news reported in October 2014 that health experts are fast-tracking tests for various vaccines, and hope to have millions of experimental doses in 2015. The Ebola virus currently spreads only through direct contact with bodily fluids, but some of the nation’s top infectious disease experts worry that this deadly virus could mutate and be transmitted just by a cough or a sneeze, according to CNN. “It’s the single greatest concern I’ve had in my 40-year public health career,” said Dr. Michael Osterholm, director of the Center for Infectious Disease Research and Policy at the University of Minnesota. “I can’t imagine anything in my career – and this includes HIV --- that would be more devastating to the world than a respiratory transmissible Ebola virus.”
<http://www.cnn.com/2014/09/12/health/ebola-airborne/>

It’s relevant to understand the history of gene-spliced, mutated micro-organisms designed for biological warfare (that predate the Internet) to understand how to survive such devastating viruses. In the early 1940’s it was nuclear fusion; in the 1980’s it was biological technology, an out-of-control Manhattan Project hemorrhaging sinusously upon the world scene like a nuclear mushroom, caught in the winds of scientific whimsy. Today much of that gene-splicing research has been officially shut down, but continues covertly in corporate laboratories around the world. Few civilians realize that Ebola is the least worrisome of the world’s bio-warfare arsenal, which might explain why the U.S. was woefully unprepared to repel the first 2014 Ebola outbreak test cases.

History of Germ Warfare:

Historically, the United States originally developed methods of induction and activation of germ warfare agents at Fort Detrick, Maryland for defensive capabilities following World War II. The Senate Select Committee on Intelligence and Senator Edward Kennedy’s Subcommittee on Health and Scientific Research held public hearings in 1977 and the CBW program at Fort Detrick was subsequently shut down.

Fast forward to 1992 when Dr. Ken Alibek arrived in the United States after the fall of the Soviet Union. In Russia, Dr. Alibek was Dr. Kanatjan Alibekov, deputy chief of research and production for the Soviet biological-weapons program at Biopreparat, a sprawling, clandestine enterprise which had research-and-production facilities across the Soviet Union. As Dr. Alibekov, Ken Alibek had thirty-two thousand scientists and staff people working under him.

When he was sent to the United States in December 1991 to observe the status of government biological weapons facilities, Alibek was astonished to learn they were rusted, outdated, and unused. Prior to this visit he had been told by the KGB that Russia was in competition with the U.S. in bio-war technology.

According to Richard Preston in his article "Annals of War - The Bioweaponeers" published in New Yorker magazine on March 9, 1998, Alibek was head of the Stepnagorsk bioweapons facility, in what is now Kazakhstan, which was once the largest biowarfare production facility in the world. <http://cryptome.info/0001/bio-weap.htm>

Ken Alibek is part of a scattering of biologists who came out of Russia following the breakup of the Soviet Union. Government funding for research decreased dramatically, and scientists who were working in the biowarfare program found themselves without jobs. Some of them went looking abroad. A few came to the United States or Great Britain, but most went elsewhere. "No one knows where they are," Alibek said. "One can guess that they've ended up in Iraq, Syria, Libya, China, Iran, perhaps Israel, perhaps India -- but no one really knows, probably not even the Russian government."

As of year 2,000, Dr. Alibek, who resides on the east coast, said he particularly worries about lethal genetically engineered viruses, i.e., contagious, airborne organisms. In his 1999 book "Biohazard," published by Random House, Alibek warns: "Few Americans are aware that they are living under a state of national emergency relating to weapons of mass destruction."

Indeed, the discovery of synthetic lab-created retroviruses designed to attack the very nature of human immunity is in the hands of every major country in the world. While the stalemate continues, people go about their ordinary lives, and governments ponder who will use it first; will it be used for good or evil? It can be used to seek out and detect cancer causing viruses, or as a biological weapon.

The technology is complicated for dissemination to the general public, civilians are not educated on the subject, thus fear of the unknown and unseen creates silent terror in a population. The New York Times reported on April 24, 1998 that President Bill Clinton, after reading "The Cobra Event," a 1997 fictional book based on scientific fact about a biological attack on New York City, immediately convened a panel of experts to brief him on preparations for biological warfare. A subsequent report suggested stockpiling vaccines, antibiotics and antidotes, and setting up mechanisms to make large quantities in a hurry.

A secret drill simulating a germ warfare attack in which a small pox hybrid virus was dropped along the Mexican-American border showed the U.S. government was unprepared to deal with such a crisis. Officials who participated in the drill soon found themselves overwhelmed by a panicked population, short of antibiotics and vaccines, hampered by antiquated quarantine laws, and unable to get trained, immunized medical personnel to the scene, the Times reported.

The technology IS scary, to be sure, and that doesn't change the fact of its existence, however people can educate themselves on the options. Patrick Henry once said, (on the brink of the American revolution): Excerpted - "We are apt to shut our eyes against a painful truth, and listen to the song of that siren till she transforms us into beasts --- For my part, whatever anguish of spirit it may cost, I am willing to know the whole truth; to know the worst, and to provide for it."

Biology of a Recombinant Virus

Genetic engineering has brought forth cures for diseases and synthetic spray vaccines, while it paradoxically spawned deadly predator viruses that mutate at will and can jump species from a spider host to a mosquito, lizard, mouse, cat, monkey or human. The new hyper-mutant life form (virus) can even live inside a bacteria host and multiply until it explodes out of the cell and finds its way into the bloodstream. (Thousands of tiny virus cells can hide and replicate inside one bacteria cell).

Weapons-related genetic engineering, in military terms, is the creation of genetically altered viruses and bacteria in order to enhance their power as weapons. This can be done by altering an organism's DNA, or its genetic code, which is found in every cell and in every virus particle in existence. In high schools in the United States today, students are taught how to do genetic engineering. They learn how to create new variants of (safe) bacteria which are resistant to antibiotics.

In 1990 and 1991, Russian scientists found a way to splice Venezuelan equine encephalitis (a brain virus) into the genome, or DNA, of smallpox. The result was a "recombinant chimera virus" called Veepox. In ancient Greek mythology, the chimera was a monster made of parts of different animals. Recombination means the mixing of genes from different organisms. Under a microscope, the Veepox looks like smallpox, but it isn't. It is a new form of life.

Understanding the biology of a deadly Level-4 (90% fatality) virus, how it was conceived, and by whom, is the first step in combating the effects of biological warfare. The books "The Hot Zone" and "The Cobra Event" by Richard Preston, an MIT and American Institute of Physics award winning science writer, provide clear scientific data on Level-4 viral outbreaks in the U.S. and Africa, and give valuable information on bio-hazard protection against these microorganisms.

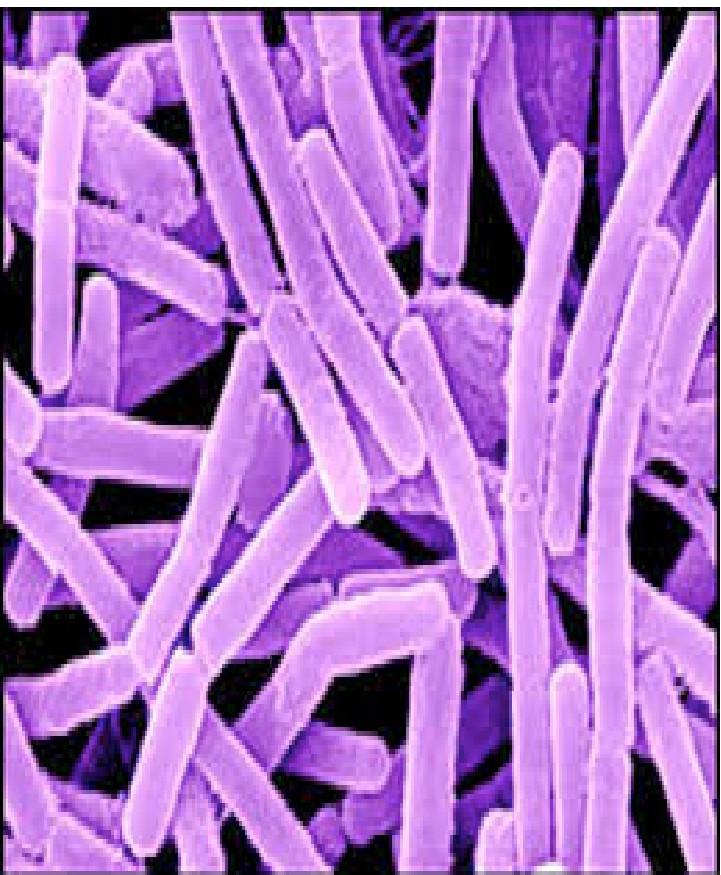

The book, "Emerging Viruses," by Dr. Leonard Horowitz, a Harvard graduate with a master of arts degree in health education and a master of public health degree in behavioral science, suggests that the Ebola virus has also become a biological weapon.

Spray Vaccines for Anthrax & Plague

The biotechnology revolution was launched when Dr. Joshua Lederberg, a professor at Rockefeller University, won the Nobel Prize in 1946 for discovering that bacteria can swap genes with each other. By 1970 huge bio programs, administered by the Rockefeller Foundation in cooperation with the CIA, provided experimental vaccines to millions of recipients worldwide. Subsequently, Dr. Lederberg became advisor to the government on biological weapons and the potential for bio-terrorism.

Fifteen years ago, Rockefeller University in cooperation with SIGA Pharmaceuticals developed a revolutionary nasal spray antidote for military defense applications. The Defense Advanced Research Projects Agency (DARPA) funded the research under the umbrella of the Department of Defense.

The nasal spray, called a “mucosal vaccine,” was the latest breakthrough in vaccine technology. It is a rapidly deployable defense against biological warfare agents such as anthrax and plague, and can be administered by a soldier, civilian, or even a child. No needles or shots are necessary. This genetically engineered commensal delivers an antigen (stimulates the production of antibodies) from a variety of pathogens (cause of disease), viral or bacterial, to surfaces in the mouth, nasal passages, gastrointestinal and genital tracts. By combining a specific antigen with specific commensals (harmless bacteria that naturally inhabit the body’s mucosal surfaces), vaccines or other neutralizing agents are rapidly produced. It is not known, when, if ever, this spray vaccine will be marketed to the general population, but someone stands to make $billions, akin to a biological Bill Gates, if a large-scale bio-war outbreak occurs in the United States.

Quarantine Trials

A telling article by World Health Organization [WHO] consultants in March 1970 presciently warned of grave psychological consequences if a biological pandemic occurred in the U.S.: “The response to a chemical or biological attack may require precautionary or other measures on such a scale that extraordinary means of social control will have to be introduced, and these may remain in force long after the need for them has passed. Thus an attack may lead to social changes out of all proportion to the actual damage done.”

The 1994 book, “The Hot Zone” by Richard Preston unwittingly corroborates the WHO consultants’ prediction of “extraordinary means of social control.” During the 1976 Ebola outbreak in Kinshasa, the World Health Organization and public officials sent the Army in to enforce quarantines; roadblocks were set up, hospital staff were quarantined inside the hospital, planes and boats were not allowed in or out, communications were cut off, and anyone trying to leave the city was shot.

Ebola: A Russian Bio-Weapon

On yet another continent, in April 1988, Dr. Nikolai Ustinov, a forty-four year old scientist at a virology-research facility in Western Siberia pricked his finger with a needle and contracted the Ebola virus. He had been studying its potential as a bio-weapon that could be loaded into special biological warheads on the MIRV missiles that were aimed at the United States. At the time, the Soviet missile warheads were designed for strategic genetically engineered strains of smallpox virus, anthrax, and Black death which was resistant to antibiotics.

The deputy chief at the Biopreparat facility, Dr. Kanatjan Alibekov (Ken Alibek), attempted to obtain the special immune serum from the Ministry of Defense, but bureaucratic delays prevented its arrival in Siberia until it was too late. After moving to the United States in 1992, Alibek told American officials the Ebola strain had been obtained by Soviet intelligence, but he didn't know where it came from, maybe Marburg, Germany, he said.

The Soviets froze Ustinov's blood and body parts and kept the Ustinov Ebola strain alive and replicating in the Biopreparat lab called Vector. They named the strain Variant U, after Ustinov, and mass produced it in simple bio-reactors. They dried Variant U, processed it into an inhalable dust, resembling pink talcum powder, then tested the airborne weapon on animals in special explosion-test chambers. Just one to five microscopic particles of Variant U lodged in the lungs of a monkey was equal in lethality to eight thousand spores of weapons-grade anthrax.

Variant U was on the verge of becoming a strategic bio-weapon, ready to be loaded into MIRV warheads, when the Soviet Union fell apart and Russian scientists left to work in other countries.

Hantavirus in Russia?

In the New Yorker magazine article entitled, “Annals of War - The Biowaponeers,” by Richard Preston, Alibek discussed accidental contamination of the soil outside a bio-factory at Omutninsk. Wild rodents living in the woods outside the factory had become chronically infected with the Schu-4 military strain of tularemia, a bacterium that causes a type of pneumonia, which was being developed in the plant. It was a hot, lethal strain that came from the United States: an American biological weapon that the Soviets had managed to obtain. The mutant bacteria had “jumped species,” from its natural host to rodents. People catch tularemia easily from rodents, noted Preston. <http://cryptome.info/0001/biowap.htm>

In April 1998, health officials began monitoring mice populations near a government research facility in Colorado Springs in the United States. The Associated Press reported a 17-year-old boy who lived on a ranch west of Colorado Springs, died on April 18th of Hantavirus. The press described Hantavirus as “a rare pneumonia-like disease [which] is contracted by ingesting airborne dust particles of the feces, urine or saliva of tiny deer mice.”

Aged: Targets of Bio-War

The world’s most serious known bio-weapon outbreak occurred in the Ural Mountains east of Moscow at Yekaterinburg. In April 1979, the military microbiology lab there known as Compound 19, emitted a cloud of human inhalation anthrax spores that spread downwind killing 68 people and contaminating livestock and food sources. A subsequent study from Harvard University, based on research at the scene, noted the absence of any victims under the age of 24. In February 1998, the Washington Post reported that a news conference in Moscow revealed the 1979 leak did not release anthrax, but some kind of “new biological weapon” that was designed to target middle-aged men.

Bio-Terrorism Comes in Many Forms

Establishing the truth about U.S., Iraqi, or Russian biological weapons programs is ambiguous because research on defensive means, such as vaccines, and on offensive weapons involves identical equipment. If a scientist is developing a defensive vaccine, he must test it against a virulent agent. And even small quantities of these virulent organisms can be grown to significant quantities in a few weeks and moved around the country in portable bio-reactors.

Bio-terrorism comes in many forms: A hantavirus leak into the general population from a secret bio-research facility; a super-mutant antibiotic-resistant staphylococcus found in hospitals; contaminated experimental vaccines injected into Gulf War soldiers; genocide in Africa; pharmaceutical profiteers creating retroviruses, then making millions on miracle cures and vaccines; a terrorist suitcase left in a New York subway; military bio-quarantine containments and social controls; and last but not least, the threat of biological warfare.

Remedies

It is likely the 21st Century will be called the Biological Age. The children of the third millennium face an invisible challenge, a new life form created in laboratories by scientists standing on the edge of existence, shaking their fists at Heaven. As ancient man survived predator dinosaurs with his wits and the tools at hand, so have Americans emerged from the Nuclear Age unscathed. Perhaps with the demise of T- Rex, man felt compelled to create his own deadly challenges through technology. The most deadly discovery, genetically engineered viruses, are above all subject to natural law, because they are the most fundamental and fragile of all life forms.

The deaths of over 6,000 Ebola victims in 2014 may be a harbinger of future U.S. vulnerability. Education is the only defense against these lethal viruses. Keep in mind that even the most sophisticated predator-virus DNA material degenerates and falls apart when exposed to sunlight (ultra-violet rays). Viruses like dry, “dead air” (enclosed air spaces), and dust and darkness. They have difficulty surviving exposure to moisture, sunlight and fresh air. They can be eradicated from any contaminated area with simple household bleach, and they must enter the body through injections, open cuts, eyelids, lips, or mucous membranes, all of which can be covered or protected with readily available bio-protective gear, most of which is commonly used in hospitals.

Virus-proof surgical masks, eye goggles, face shields, surgical gloves, scrub suits, plastic caps, and much more can be purchased at most medical supply stores. Doctors and dentists use them daily. *See list at bottom of this article.

Protective Gear

In his book “The Hot Zone,” Richard Preston describes in detailed layman’s terms the equipment and procedures used by the USAMRIID bio-hazard team from Fort Detrick to decontaminate the Reston Primate Quarantine Unit during an Ebola virus outbreak in 1989.

The Reston “deconn” was a field operation, conducted entirely outside a contained Level-4 bio-lab. Ebola is considered a Level-4 (90% fatality) “hot” agent, which can be inhaled into the lungs when exposed at close range to coughing or sneezing droplets.

Other known field operations include an expedition by Ft. Detrick scientists into the Rift Valley in Africa to locate the suspected source of Ebola virus in remote Kitum Cave, Mount Elgin. The scientists camped outside the cave and used field bio-protective equipment to enter the cave and take samples from rocks, animals and insects. Ebola was not found in the cave, or anywhere else in the natural environment. Nevertheless, the equipment used provides valuable information to those who are interested.

The equipment worn at Kitum Cave in 1988 included orange colored “Racal” bio-suits, which are positive pressure space suits with battery powered air supplies; used primarily at that time by Ft. Detrick scientists in field work with extreme bio-hazardous airborne viruses. The suit was fully portable, with a self-contained breathing apparatus. Military gas masks with twin-purple virus filters fitted over hoods were used to enter the cave.

The military bio-hazard operation in Reston, Virginia in 1989 included much of the stockpiled gear used at Kitum Cave. In this instance, bio-protective gear used to enter the Ebola contaminated monkey house included light-weight Racal suits, battery packs, rubber gloves (over surgical gloves), surgical scrub suits (under bio-suits), flashlights, blunt scissors, plastic bottles, bio-hazard bags, and most importantly “hand-pumped garden sprayers for spraying bleach” on bio-suits and objects that needed to be “deconned” [decontaminated] as they exited the monkey house.

The procedure went as follows: The team put on surgical scrub suits, then entered a storage room used for a staging area inside the monkey building. The suits were orange field biological Racal suits, commonly used with airborne biological agents. The pressurized suit has a clear, soft plastic bubble for a helmut. Air pressure was supplied by an electric motor that sucks air from the outside and passes it through "virus filters," then injects it into the suit. This keeps the suit under positive pressure so that any airborne virus particles will have a hard time flowing into it. It protects the entire body from virus, surrounding the body with super-filtered air.

Next the rubber gloves were put on and taped with military sticky tape to the sleeves of the suits. On their feet, they wore sneakers, and over the sneakers they pulled bright yellow rubber boots. The support team taped the boots to the legs of the suits to make an airtight seal above the ankle. The electric blower was switched on and the suits puffed up. The military brown sticky tape was used during the operation to tape shut any rips that occurred in the suit. This prevented the suits from losing pressure and getting contaminated inside.

The rule inside the monkey house storage room airlock was that both doors, the far door and the near door, could never be opened at the same time. This to prevent a back-flow of contaminated air from flowing into the staging room. The batteries that pressurized the suit had a life span of 6 hours. When the team emerged from the monkey house into the airlock, the support team sprayed the team members for five minutes with bleach. The suits were placed in bags and the bags sprayed with bleach. Everything that went down the drain had bleach poured after it to prevent Ebola from getting into the sewer system.

In 1993 author Richard Preston trekked up Mt. Elgin to Kitum Cave in deepest Africa. The following description of "field" procedures and equipment he used in this remote area is outstanding in value to the reader and entirely unique in detail.

It reads as follows: (Excerpted) "I unzipped my backpack and withdrew my gear and laid it on the rocks. I had assembled the components of a Level-4 field biological space suit. It was not a pressurized suit - not an orange Racal suit. It was a neutral- pressure whole-body suit with a hood and full-face respirator. The suit itself was made of Tyvek, a slick, white fabric that is resistant to moisture and dust.

"I laid out a pair of green rubber gauntlet gloves, yellow rubber boots, a black mask with twin purple [virus] filters. The mask was a silicone rubber North respirator mask with a Lexan faceplate, for good visibility, and the purple filters were the kind that stop a virus. I placed a roll of sticky tape on the rocks. A plastic shower cap - ten cents apiece at Woolworths. Flashlight, head lamp ---

"I stepped into the suit, feet first, pulled it up to my armpits, and fed my arms into the sleeves. I stretched the shower cap over my head, then pulled the hood of the suit down over the shower cap. I zipped up the front of the suit, from crotch to chin. I taped the front zipper of the suit, taped the wrists of my gloves to the suit, taped the cuffs of the boots to the suit ---" Preston then attached an electric miners lamp on his head.

When Preston exited the cave, he deconned himself as follows: He took a plastic laundry tub and filled it with water from a nearby waterfall. Then he poured a gallon of bleach into it. Then he stepped into the tub, placed his gloved hands into the liquid and scooped it over his capped head and face mask.

Using a toilet brush, he scrubbed his boots and legs. Then he dropped his flashlight and headlamp into the bleach mixture, took off his face-mask and dunked it along with the purple virus filters. Then he peeled off his green gauntlet gloves, then stepped out of his Tyvek suit, peeling the sticky tape off as he went. The whole suit, together with the yellow boots, went into the bleach. "It was a stew of bio-hazard gear," he said. The suit and gear was double-bagged, washed outside with bleach, then bagged again, then bleached again.

An incredible feat by a courageous researcher, yet no less complicated than deep sea diving or sledding the Alaskan wilderness in the dead of winter. Both require special protective clothing and a knowledge of the elements. Few would enter the wilderness or the sea unprepared. Today's microbes are an inescapable element, the most basic of all creation, that will challenge us in the coming years, just as computer technology challenged us over a decade ago. No one is helpless in the wake of emerging viruses, education is the key. A quote by Louis Pasteur sums it up best: "Chance favors the prepared mind."

Government Warning

On April 22, 1998, author Richard Preston went before the Senate Judiciary Subcommittee on Technology, Terrorism and Government Information and the Senate Select Committee on Intelligence regarding chemical and biological weapons threats to America. He presciently underlined the need for the United States to stockpile the smallpox vaccine, noting there was currently only 7 million usable doses on hand. "Experts believe that in any terrorist release of smallpox, even a small one, the virus is so contagious that it would be necessary to vaccinate at least 20 to 30 million Americans to stop the outbreak," said Preston.

Preston warned the Senate that the smallpox virus would be easy to make in large quantities by a terrorist. "I'm not going to say exactly how to do it, but basically you can grow it in glass bottles the size of wine bottles. A room full of these bottles constitutes a national biological-weapons laboratory. Virtually any nation can have such a facility, and hide it easily. All you need is a master seed strain and a few Ph.D. scientists and perhaps $200,000 worth of equipment, which can be bought on the open market. Have scientists left Russia bringing their expertise and master seed strains of smallpox with them, or other bio-weapon seed strains?" he asked the Senate.

Government Preparedness -Year 2000

On February 4-5, 2000 the Western Regional Bio-Terrorism Conference was held at the La Jolla Marriott Hotel in San Diego, California. The conference was sponsored by the County of San Diego, University of California - San Diego School of Medicine, and John Hopkins Center for Civilian BioDefense Studies in association with Science Applications International Corporation.

The conference cost $125 per person, per day and was open to the general public, though it was not advertised to the public until opening day, and then no location was disclosed. Rooms A through E were devoted to the conference with an adjacent Exhibits Hall. Some of the materials displayed on exhibit tables originated from the following sources:

- (1)      Center for Civilian BioDefense - Johns Hopkins University.

- (2) BioDefense Quarterly - Publication of Johns Hopkins University.
- (3) Center for COMMUNITY Disaster Preparedness & Response.
- (4) Amateur Rescuer - Disaster Preparedness & Response Magazine.
- (5) Manual on Western Regional Conference on Bio-Terrorism (161-pages).
- (6) Bio-Terrorism Participant Listing - 19-pages of names, title, city, specialty, who participated in the conference.
- (7) C.E.R.T. - Community Emergency Response Team - advertised as "regular" folks that had been trained by the local fire department to assist them, the police and other disaster relief crews in time of disaster.

A professional audio-tape package enclosed within a bound folder, along with the conference manual, was sold at a table outside the auditorium. The audio-tapes for the entire conference could be purchased from Castle Communications. The entire collection cost $99.00 + tax + $10. S&H.

An enthusiastic fireman who was manning a booth inside the Exhibit Hall noted that bio-terrorism is "sweeping the nation like a firestorm." He said everyone in government, first responders, and military were urgently training for bio-defense.

Across the aisle an empty booth displayed individual, airtight, clear bio-tents where sick civilians would be placed under field conditions in the event of a large biological outbreak. These tents would be used to quarantine civilians after the hospitals were filled to capacity and infected people were sent to containment areas. It didn't require much imagination to envision an entire stadium filled with civilians inside bio-tents being treated by doctors and nurses wearing bio space-suits.

The conversation with the fireman went as follows:

CS: "What type of bio-equipment is your department using?"

Fireman: "The standard Tyvek Bio-Suits and Chem-Bio respirators."

CS: "Do the respirators have twin-purple virus filters?"

Fireman: "I haven't heard of that."

CS: "Thousands of virus cells can live inside one bacteria cell. A bacteria filter won't keep a virus out. What kind of containment procedures have you developed for a Hot Zone?"

Fireman: "Well, we [the firemen] won't actually be in the front line, in the Hot Zone. The first line of defense will be handled by the Military."

CS: "Oh, so the sick and dying civilians will be passed on to the first responders by the Military?"

Fireman: "Yes, they will handle the containment."

CS: "Have you ever heard of an actual containment situation?"

Fireman: "No."

CS: "Well, during the 1976 Ebola outbreak in Kinshasa, Africa, the military contained an entire city. The hospitals, doctors, nurses, were quarantined. No ships, no planes, no person was allowed in or out. Anyone attempting to leave the area was shot. The phone lines were shut down - no calls in or out."

Fireman: "What's your point?"

CS: "I plan to write to the participants at this conference, asking for names of manufacturers of bio-suits and respirators with virus-filters. Most Israeli citizens were provided respirators during the Persian Gulf War. That's a pretty good deterrent against a bio-terrorism outbreak --- in Israel."

Fireman: "Well, that would put a burden on U.S. manufacturers of bio-suits and respirators; currently they're backlogged and trying to keep up with government orders."

CS: "Well, then they need to upgrade their production. If the equipment costs $3,000 now, it could cost $20,000 after the first outbreak."

Fireman: Nodding. "Yeah someone stands to make a lot of money after an outbreak."

CS: "Have any of the speakers at this conference addressed Civilian Preparedness, i.e., civilian bio-suits and respirators?"

Fireman: Hesitating, as if a lightbulb had been turned on in his mind. "Well, no."

CS: "I'll bet all the participants at this conference have bio-suits and respirators, don't they?"

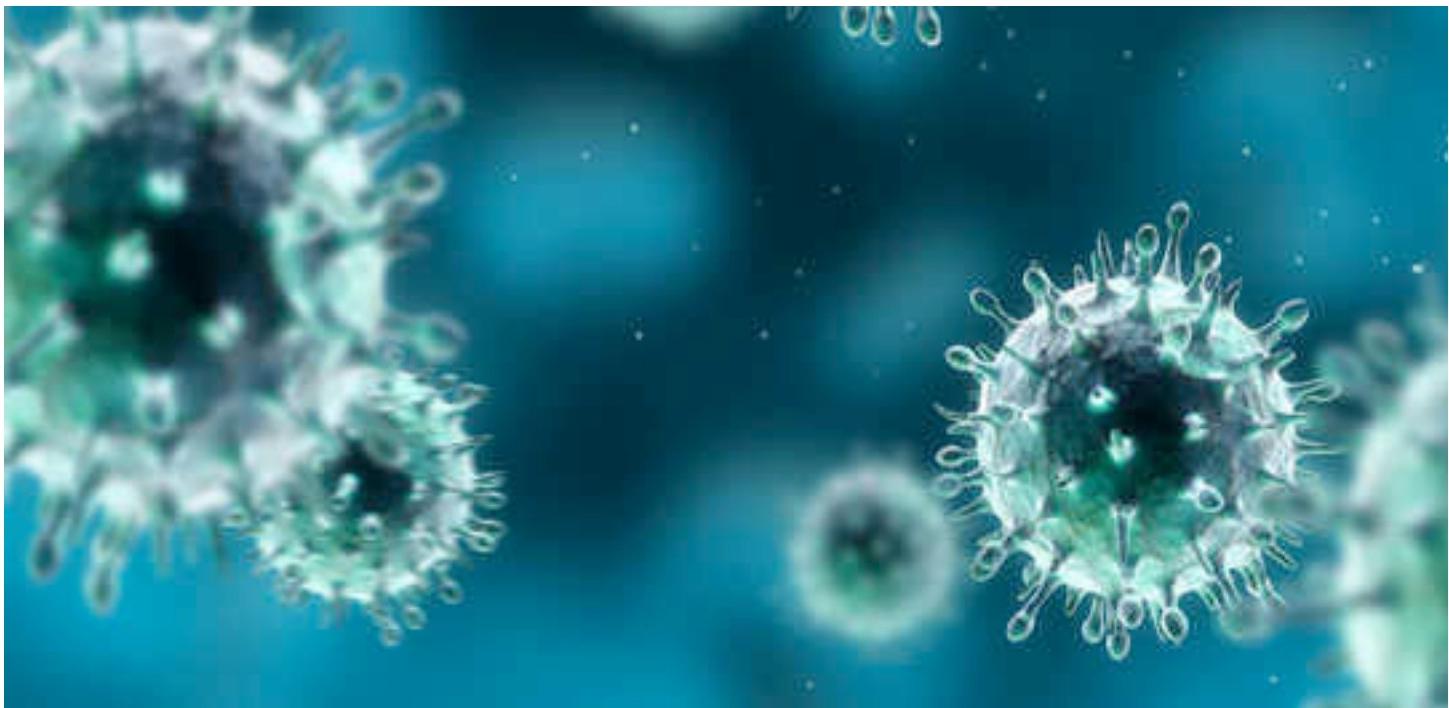

The fireman chose not to respond.

Anthrax Vaccines Unreliable

On March 9, 2000, Rep. Christopher Shays released a report calling for suspension of the anthrax mandatory immunization program for U.S. troops. He had found the DOD Anthrax Vaccine Immunization Program to be unsustainable in its present form due to "unreliable vaccine supply, uncertain program safety and unproven efficacy against the validated threat."

If the U.S. government is unable to produce a reliable anthrax vaccine for military troops, where does that leave American civilians? Why has no one publicly outlined exactly what would be done with infected civilians in the event of a large-scale, contagious outbreak? Currently experts advise civilians to "go to a hospital" if they are in a hot zone, or effected area.

Only those who survive the disease can provide antibodies to make vaccines and it would take years to develop enough vaccine to treat large populations. These designer viruses can be genetically altered at will, thus it would be pointless to manufacture vaccines for every virus capability. Only a vaccine that kills all viruses would be effective in today's biological arsenal, and that hasn't been developed yet.

So What is the Answer?

The immediate answer is hiding in plain view. Most of the television coverage during the 2014 Ebola scare depicted hazmat teams running around in bio-suits while TV anchormen and women reported in the forefront wearing ordinary street clothing. One wonders if they were thinking, "What am I doing here?"

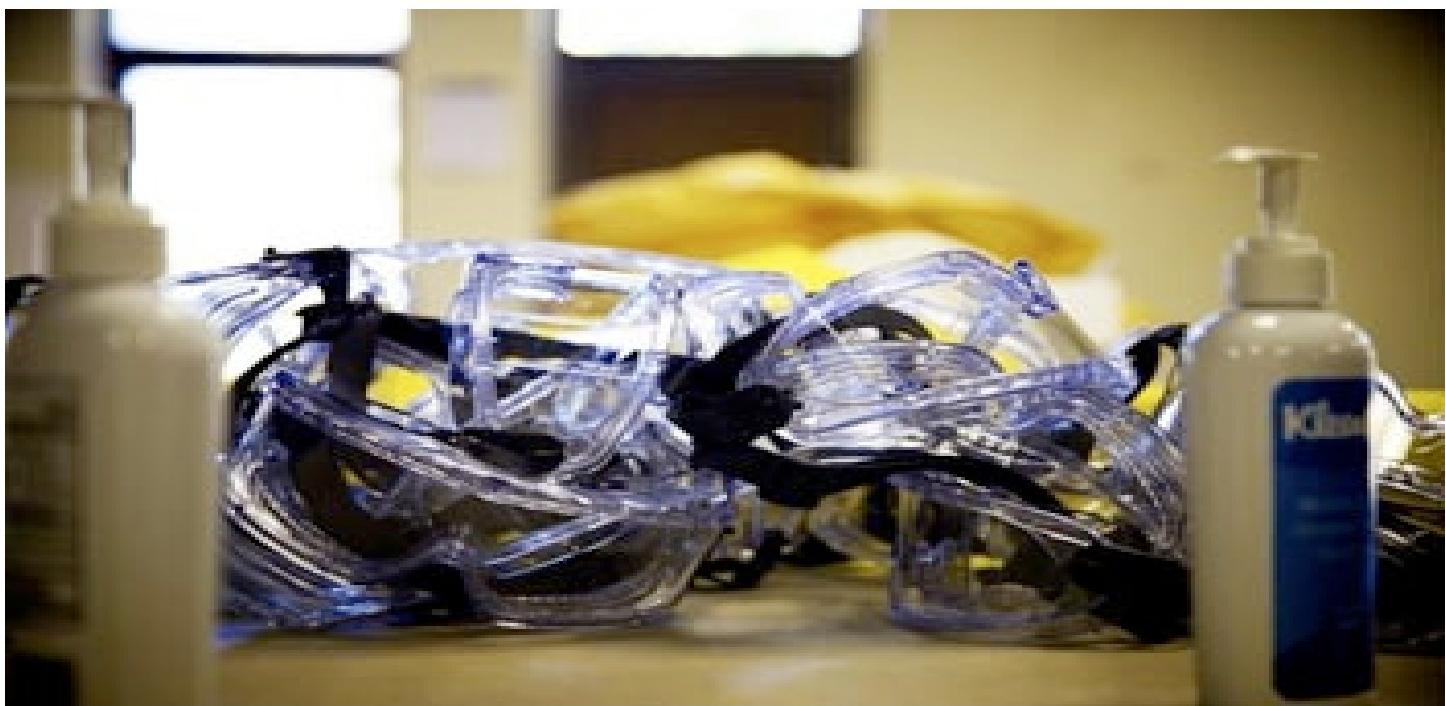

To date, the only segment of the population which has no access to emergency biohazard equipment are civilians. First responders, firemen, police, hospitals, military, and even Congress have direct access to bio-suits and respirators. Yet, civilians are deprived of this same protection, despite the fact it is their tax money that is paying for this gear.

Bio-experts say it's ridiculous to purchase gas masks. They're right. Common gas masks do not protect against viruses, they protect against gas and chemicals, and most surplus stores sell antiquated and leaky gas masks anyway. Nevertheless, the experts could suggest other methods of protection, even if it is minimal, but they refuse to educate civilians on how to survive a bio attack before it occurs, or where to buy protective equipment, because it might cause a panic.

On October 25, 2000, the Center for Disease Control [CDC] published a report on the Internet entitled "Interim Recommendations for the Selection and Use of Protective Clothing and Respirators Against Biological Agents." The web address is:

<http://www.bt.cdc.gov/DocumentsApp/Anthrax/Protective/10242001Protect.asp>

The recommendations were technical in nature, suggesting the use of half-mask or full facepiece air-purifying respirators with particulate filter efficiencies ranging from N95 to P100 as a minimum level of protection.

For maximum protection against a lethal unidentified bio-weapon the CDC recommended the following: Emergency first responders should use “self-contained breathing apparatus (SCBA) respirators with a full facepiece operated in the most protective, positive pressure (pressure demand) mode during emergency responses. This type of SCBA provides the highest level of protection against airborne hazards when properly fitted to the user’s face and properly used. National Institute for Occupational Safety and Health (NIOSH) respirator policies state that, under those conditions, SCBA reduces the user’s exposure to the hazard by a factor of at least 10,000.”

Manufacturers of NIOSH-approved [certified], pressure-demand SCBA respirators and Level A protective suits sell only to first responders, military, and government agencies. This equipment is not available to civilians, but OSHA-approved mine safety respirators [P-100 particulate] might be.

Today the U.S. government is mindful of terrorists using biological weapons of mass destruction against the U.S. population. Yet, to date, it has not developed defensive measures for civilians, such as mass-produced protective equipment, or even development of immune boosting technology.

Dr. Ken Alibek, in his 1999 book “Biohazard,” admits there is little current protection against today’s emerging viruses, but points out that over the past two decades, scientists have vastly expanded their understanding of how the immune system works. “This knowledge can be exploited to provide a new form of medical defense against biological agents,” he wrote.

Essentially, Alibek promotes the notion that immunology is the ultimate weapon against biowarfare, particularly non-specific immunity in which cytokine molecules stimulate the secretion of antibodies and prompt the growth and activation of a host of immune cells. Most cannot kill viruses or bacteria on their own, but they have been found to boost the immune system and enable patients to respond to previously unproductive treatments. They have also been shown to increase the effectiveness of T-lymphocytes including natural killer cells which destroy pathogenic bacteria and cells invaded by viruses.

Alibek concluded, "Nothing will replace the long-term protection provided by vaccines against specific diseases, but boosting the non-specific immune system may offer at least temporary protection from pathogenic agents and possibly go even further. If administered in the crucial first hours after an attack - when authorities are still trying to identify which agent was used and organize a medical response - such a booster could help contain the crisis. It is a long shot, but everything I know about biological weapons tells me that this is far more promising than attempts to rig office buildings and public monuments with detection devices or to stockpile vaccines." [pp 290].

The notion of immunotherapy was never really a focus of either the research community or big pharma until about a decade ago, when the U.S. as well as the public health agency of Canada finally realized the importance of developing antibodies against the Ebola virus and thus funded a few research projects leading to "monoclonal antibodies." In 2014, ZMapp serum was made available for two health-care workers who were infected with Ebola during their work in Liberia. Of the few doses available, the two health-care workers from the U.S. were infused with ZMapp serum and both survived. <http://journal.frontiersin.org/Journal/10.3389/fimmu.2014.00562/full>

Nevertheless, the answer for civilians is clear: they're essentially on their own for the time being. It's time to get bio-educated and improvise until the government gets its act together.

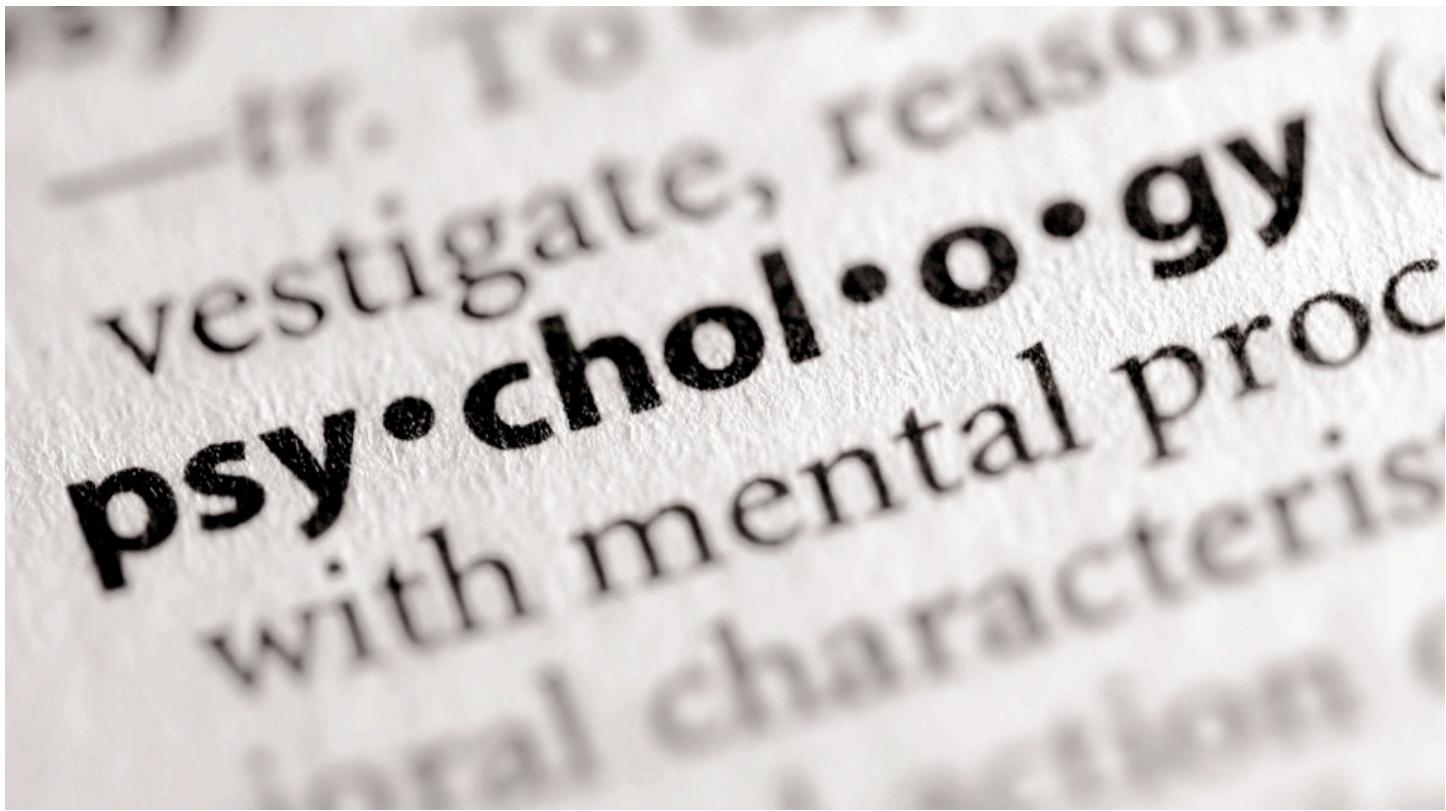

The Federal Emergency Management Agency [FEMA] published a preparedness manual on the Internet entitled: "Your Family Disaster Supplies Kit" which offers details for assembling a disaster supplies kit, including the six basics: "water, food, first aid supplies, clothing and bedding, tools and emergency supplies and special items." The manual advises people to "keep the items that you would most likely need during an evacuation in an easy-to-carry container."

But the manual does not address biological warfare preparations. Few publications do; bio-gear and procedures had not been tested under actual emergency conditions until the recent Ebola scare in 2014. Thus civilians can look to the medical community for improvisation on bio-protective gear in lieu of bio-suits and virus-proof respirators. Most medical supply stores, some pharmacies, hardware stores, and even Walmart carry the following gear which can be worn while standing in long lines to receive treatment during a bio outbreak.

It is important to keep in mind that some weaponized or powdered anthrax spores that have been reduced to five-microns or smaller can pass through a surgical mask. Some experts are suggesting the use of mine safety respirators [P-100 particulate] that reportedly can be purchased by civilians at some hardware stores or through an industrial supplier.

1. Shower caps. Can also be purchased in bulk at beauty supply stores.
2. Disposable vinyl surgical gloves. Quantity of 100 can be purchased in box.
3. Latex dishwashing gloves to be worn over surgical gloves.
4. Two-piece hooded vinyl rain-suits.
5. Rain boots.
6. Surgical scrub-suits to be worn under rain-suits.
7. Industrial protective eye-goggles and face shields, as worn by dentists.
8. Virus-proof, germ-filter surgical masks. Bulk quantity. [As worn by surgeons]
9. Mine safety respirator - P100 particulate.
10. Bleach - lots of it.
11. Common garden sprayer to decon gear and environment with bleach or disinfectant.
12. Large container to hold bleach for decontamination of gear before entering house. To stand in while spraying bleach from head to toe before removing gear and placing in container.
13. Large plastic trash bags for decontaminated throw-away gear.
14. Military sticky-tape to wrap around wrists, ankles, to seal all openings around rain-suit and boots.
15. Ultra-violet light to decontaminate rooms in house.
16. Household disinfectants, anti-bacterial cleaners for gear that can't be deconned by bleach.
17. Antibiotics such as doxycycline, amoxicillin, or cipro, if they can be obtained.
18. Three-week supply of water and food.
19. Other improvisation as necessary.

Perhaps a quote published in Richard Preston's "Annals of War - The Bioweaponeers" [New Yorker magazine - March 9, 1998] by Dr. Peter Jahrling, chief scientist at USAMRIID (Ft. Detrick), offers some hope --- "I don't think anyone could knock out New York City with a genetically engineered bug, but someone might be able to knock out a few people and thereby make an incredible panic."

Who has the Monopoly on Life

By Jamie Hanshaw

In the late 1800's a man from Vienna named Sigmund Freud thought up a new theory about human nature that has shaped our culture into what it is today. His ideas about how the mind works have become an accepted part of society and his theories are today's standard for psychiatrists. Freud devised a method he called psychoanalysis by using hypnosis, analyzing dreams and practicing free association, in which patients would lie on a couch and report their spontaneous thoughts. By doing this, he discovered what he said were powerful sexual and aggressive forces, hidden deep within us which were the remnants of our animal past. His hypothesis is that these forces are an unilluminated part of the mind, separate from the conscious mind, which is constantly at work molding our thoughts, feelings and actions. It has been called many things, super-ego, unconscious or the subconscious. It never sleeps and the limits to its power are unknown. It guides us in many ways and when properly employed can perform miracles. The powers that come from the subconscious are intuition, emotion, certainty, inspiration, suggestion, imagination, memory and dynamic energy. It is also a major source of the sorcerer's power when they can hack into it.

This unknown power frightened Freud and he believed that human conflicts were the result of the repression of primitive instincts hidden in the psyche. He taught that if these forces were left uncontrolled it would lead societies into chaos and destruction and he believed that the advent of WWI was evidence of the terrible truth of his findings. Feelings, he said, must be repressed because they were too dangerous.

Goethe's Faust was the literary text that Freud most frequently cited and referred to; it was the piece of literature that most powerfully influenced him throughout his life. The central event of the work is a pact between Faust and the Devil. Much of Freud's theory about dream interpretation comes from his occult research and his mythic identification with Satan and Venus. Freud was an extraordinarily controversial figure, even in his day. His followers adored him and his critics found his views to be outlandish and sometimes referred to him as "the most consummate of charlatans." Even today, feelings about him run to either extreme, people tend to love him or hate him. Was Freud a genius with the world's greatest insights into the human psyche or did he just have really good P.R.?

Edward Bernays and the Psychology of Shopping

"The conscious and intelligent manipulation of the habits and opinions of the masses is an important element in democratic society. Those who manipulate this unseen mechanism of society constitute an invisible government, which is the true ruling power of our country. We are governed, our minds are molded, our tastes formed, our ideas-suggested, largely by men that we have never heard of...Our invisible governors are in many cases, unaware of the identity of their fellow members in the inner cabinet...It is they who pull the wires, which control the public mind, who harness old social forces and contrive new ways to bind and guide the world."

-- Edward Bernays, Propaganda 1928

Anyone who has witnessed the footage of frenzied mobs shopping on black Friday could, like Freud, rapidly begin to lose faith in humanity. But do people tend to act like this on their own like he believed or is there something else guiding them?

Edward Bernays is the father of modern public relations. He was Freud's American nephew and his effects on popular culture were as great as his uncle's.

Bernays was a press agent hired to promote America's participation in WWI based on Woodrow Wilson's decree that the U.S. was fighting against old empires to bring democracy to Europe. He proved so skillful at portraying war efforts in the press that at the end of the war he was asked to attend the Paris peace conference. President Wilson's reception at the Treaty of Versailles astounded Bernays and the other propagandists at how the crowds heralded Woodrow Wilson as an icon of democracy and liberator of the people. They had made a hero. Bernays wondered if the same type of mass persuasion was possible in peace time.

He turned propaganda, which sounded negative, and called it the Council of Public Relations. He went to New York and set up his council, determined to alter the consciousness of the new industrial society. With millions clustered together in cities, he wanted to control the way these crowds thought and felt. Armed with Freud's book, A General Introduction to Psychoanalysis, he used his uncle's theories to form public opinion so that they would think such manufactured opinions were their own. Bernays was hired by William Randolph Hearst to promote his line of women's magazines which included Harper's Bazaar, ELLE, Marie Claire, Cosmopolitan, Good Housekeeping, Redbook, Seventeen and many more. Bernays was the first person to show automobile companies how they could sell cars as symbols of male sexuality and prowess. In 1939, New York hosted the World's Fair and Edward Bernays was the central adviser. He insisted that the theme be the link between democracy and capitalism. He wanted people to think that you couldn't have real democracy in anything but a capitalist society. This all went in tandem with the golden age of Hollywood where product placement and movies came together in a perfect storm of American psychological overhaul.

His most dramatic experiment was to persuade women to smoke cigarettes. In 1929 the president of the American tobacco corporation hired Bernays to find a way to break the taboo of women smoking in public. Bernays decided to stage his event at the New York Easter Day parade. He hired a group of rich debutantes to hide cigarettes under their clothes and join the parade. At a given signal from him they were to light up the cigarettes dramatically. Bernays informed the press that a group of suffragettes were preparing a protest by lighting up what they called "torches of freedom." The next day it was in newspapers all across the United States and around the world and the sale of cigarettes to woman began to rise. Bernays had made them socially acceptable with a single symbolic ad.

Meanwhile one of the main objectives at the Tavistock Institute was to achieve the degradation of women. Bernays was Tavistock's top consultant up until the time George Bush became president. In the 1930's the promotion of homosexuality and lesbianism became rampant, not out of any suppressed desires, but as a means of shocking the old establishment of morals, which is a Tavistock strategy. This was also a crucial stage of developing the plan that called for feminine behavior to be reduced to a lower standard of morality than ever thought possible. Radical changes were forced upon women of the time, which seemed impossible to stop, and has quickened at a remarkable pace since hemlines reached the knee. Anyone who has ever seen MTV's show Jersey Shore or Bravo's Real Housewives can witness how well this psychology has worked. "Tavistock recognized that Jesus Christ has brought a new place of respect in the order of civilization for womanhood, which prior to his coming had not been present. After Christ's ministry, womanhood gained a respect and a high place in society absent from pre-Christian civilizations... Tavistock sought to change that and the process began immediately after WWI"<sup>1</sup>

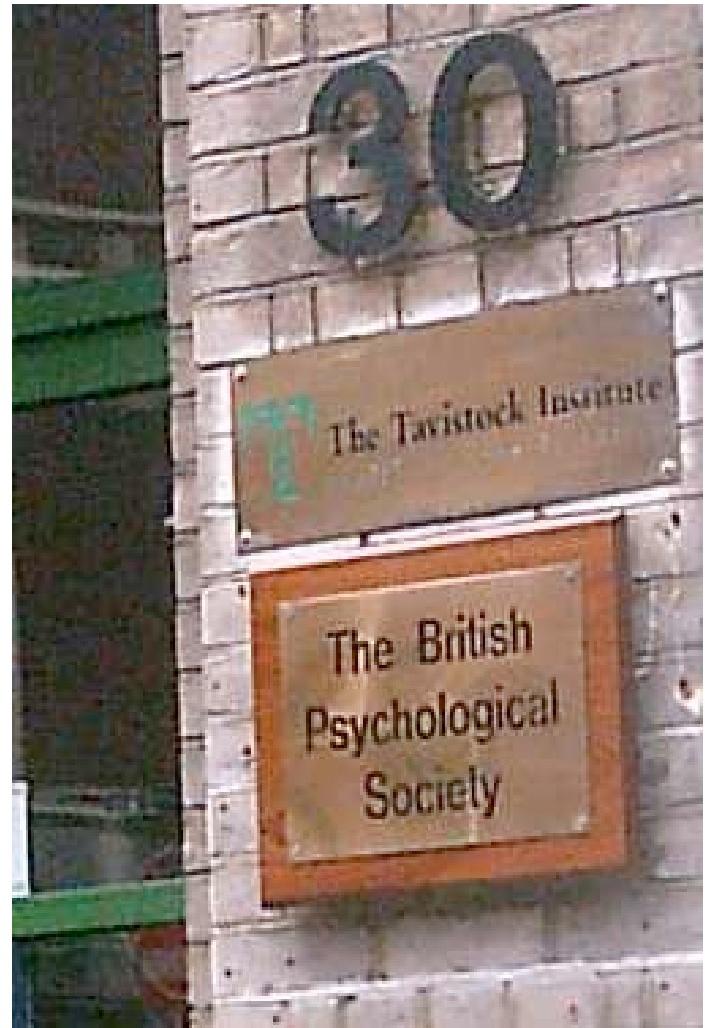

After WWII, the overproduction of mass produced goods transformed the way American consumers thought about products. It was the concern of many corporations that supply would outstrip demand and they feared their merchandise would flood the economy. In the world of advertising, psychology offered limitless potential for manipulation. This was the key to a virtually infinite need for consumption and this would, in turn justify an infinite process of production. "We must shift America from a needs to a desires culture. People must be trained to desire to want new things even before the old had been entirely consumed. We must shape a new mentality in America. Man's desires must overshadow his needs." -- Paul Mazer, Lehman Bros. Bernays taught American corporations how to get people to want things they don't need by marketing to their unconscious desires and out of this came a new political idea about how to control the masses. He called his technique of opinion-molding "engineering consent."

In the past, goods like shoes, stockings and even cars were promoted in functional terms for their durability. The aim of the advertisements were simply to show people the products practical virtues and nothing more.

But by the 1960's most Americans already owned televisions, radios, refrigerators, cars and washing machines. There was a prevailing fear in industry that it might level off. People had to be persuaded to buy new models or constantly updated versions of the older ones. This was called the principle of "planned obsolescence" where commodities were produced with a deliberately limited lifespan. Cars, for instance were designed to last approximately three years, after that they would begin to fall apart and the cost of repairs would be less economical than purchasing a new one. There was also the more sinister principle of "psychological obsolescence" where designs were modified dramatically every few years to make the owners of the old models feel outdated or unfashionable. Nowhere can this be seen more clearly today than in the marketing of Apple products. The opportunity to announce the newness of a product enabled people to flaunt pride in prosperity, while those who could not keep up are encouraged to feel shame. Once people's points of insecurity were diagnosed they were skillfully exploited. By fostering a general anxiety for just about anything, teeth, hair, skin, car, house or status, they were able achieve the systematic creation of dissatisfaction.

While Bernays was becoming rich and powerful in America, Vienna and most of Europe was suffering massive inflation. Freud lost most of his savings and facing bankruptcy and turned to his nephew for help. Bernays agreed to publish his book in America for the first time and at the same time promote the book and see to it that they were successful. Along with this book came emerging studies on the "Group Mind" which they believed operated in the baser animal unconscious irrational level. "If we understand the mechanism and motives of the group mind, it is now possible to control and regiment the masses according to our will without them knowing it."—Bernays Pessimistic and reclusive Freud began to write about group behavior and about how easily the unconscious and aggressive forces in humans could be triggered when they were in crowds. Fearing that he had underestimated their violent tendencies, he began to believe that people were far more dangerous than he had originally thought. He came to the conclusion that man was a ferocious animal. In short, he didn't like people. He wanted to be part of a new elite that could manage the bewildered herd of beasts through psychological techniques. Neither did Bernays think much of the people whose opinions he was engineering. According to his daughter, Ann Bernays "...it can be a little hard on the people around you. Especially when you make other people feel stupid. The people who worked for him were stupid, the children were stupid, and if people did things in a way that he wouldn't have done them, they were stupid. It was a word that he used over and over - don't be stupid. And the masses - They were stupid."

While Freud and his associates may have done considerable research on behavior, he didn't know everything and he's certainly not the last word on human nature. There have been several scholars who have opposed Freud's theories. One was a German philosopher Herbert Marcuse. He challenged the social world arguing that it was not a world that should be adapted to because society was corrupt, not the human psyche. He disagreed with Freud's ideas and he thought that schizophrenia was induced. Marcuse knew the idea that you needed to control people was wrong. Human beings, he said, did have inner emotional drives but were not inherently violent or irrational. It was in fact a sick society that caused mental illness. He taught that conforming to society and refusing to challenge authority was actually submitting to evil. Willhem Reich was a student of Freud who also had a fundamentally different view. He believed that the unconscious aspect of humans was essentially good and the core of human nature was the underlying libido. He believed that all neurosis was due to lack of orgasms.

After Freud's death, his daughter, Anna, became the acknowledged leader of the world's psychoanalytic movement. She saw her job as to fulfill her father's dream of making his ideas accepted throughout the world. She developed a theory of how to control the inner drives of the man-imals. It was simple-- you taught the children to conform to the rules of society. She pioneered the concept that "conformity equals happiness." By the 1950's conformity had become the basis on which a prosperous society was to be established. Corporations began to employ psychological techniques, testing and profiling was used to establish 'normality' and ensure conformity. Nowadays "normal" is waking up and getting dressed in clothes you wouldn't normally wear, sitting in traffic, in a car that you don't even own yet, to get to the job with people you don't even like. But you need that job to pay for the clothes and the car and the house that sits empty all day so that you can afford to live in it. Act normal, go to work, watch TV, obey the law, and tell yourself that you are free.

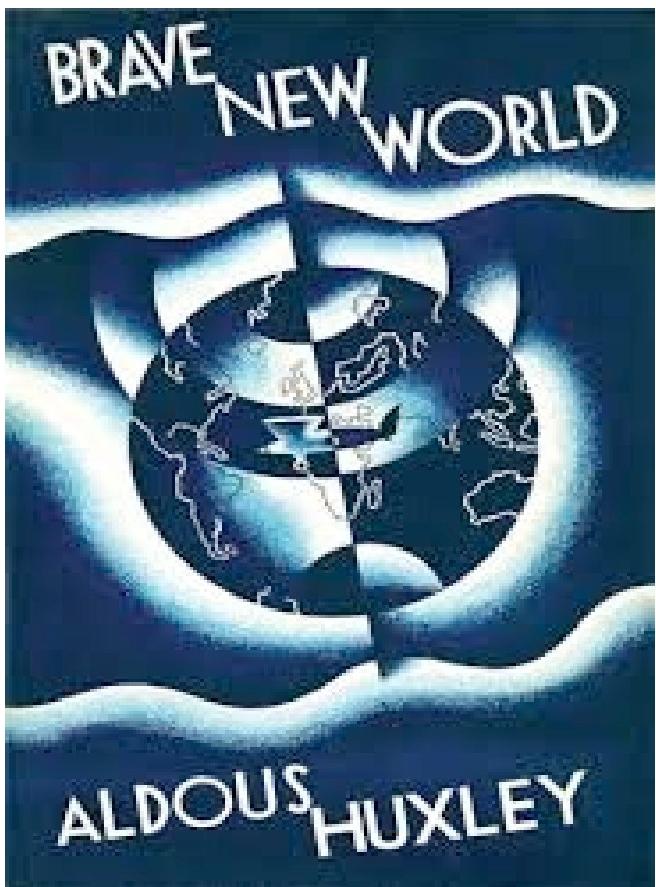

In the past, psychiatrists were far more honest and vocal about the future ramifications of their work. Mad scientists like Dr. Jose Delgado and Dr. Ewen Cameron went public with the idea that no human being has an inherent right to his own personality. The true role of psychiatry, they said, was to re-invent human character, behavior and personality from the ground up. They wanted to have physical control of the mind toward what they called the "Psychocivilized Society."

"To achieve world government, it is necessary to remove from the minds of men their individualism, loyalty to family tradition, national patriotism, and religious dogmas."

—George Brock Chisholm, in a Speech given at the Conference on Education, September 11, 1954.

The issue of mental health is about to become a huge one. Its latest spokesperson is none other than--the bastion of the new normal, Lady Gaga. Her fans are almost innumerable. At this time she holds the world's record in downloads and for having the most followers on Twitter – over 32.5 million. That's 10 times than the entire population of Australia. To make sure that all of her little monsters are receiving the best in mental health care, she will be providing psycho-therapy on her upcoming Born This Way Ball concert tour. Gaga announced that the 2013 leg of her tour will feature the BornBrave Bus, where fans can come aboard before each show and receive counseling. Wherever she performs, the BornBrave Bus will follow. The advice and pep talks will come from members of the National Council for Behavioral Health. Gaga and her mother, Cynthia, came up with the idea for their Born This Way Foundation in response to the Sandy Hook Elementary School shootings. "Now more than ever, our kids need access to support within their communities, including mental health services," reads a statement from Gaga's mother. "BornBrave Bus Is a place where mental health + depression are taken seriously w/ no judgement, FREE real help available to all. I feel like most kids don't look for help because they feel embarrassed so mom + I wanted to break the stigmas around "help" and make it fun."—From Lady Gaga's twitter.

Is this really just help for at risk youth from a concerned super star or could it be something more? In light of other recent public shootings, officials are urging the U.N. to address mental health issues on a global scale. The U.N. is setting up a worldwide mental health apparatus to evaluate people's emotional and intellectual stability. It will try to provide itself not only with the authority to evaluate people's mental competence but also the authority to send people to mental institutions and re-education camps if they are not sufficiently docile and open to the appropriate level of "normalcy." Who will be defined as mentally unfit in the future? Those who question mainstream media, the government, 9/11, global warming, chemtrails... just about anything that is outside of the official story. In the wake of the Sandy Hook massacre, President Obama stated that mental-health services must be made more available, presumably to stave off future killers. Of course, this is ridiculous, since so many killers have acted under the compelling influence of SSRI antidepressants and other brain meds. These drugs are proven to induce violence. His plan would essentially make the American Psychiatric Association and all its doctors into the new psychiatric police state; right alongside local police forces, the FBI, the ATF, DHS, and the US Marshals Service.

"The really hopeless victims of mental illness are to be found among those who appear to be most normal. Many of them are normal because they are so well adjusted to our mode of existence, because their human voice has been silenced so early in their lives that they do not even struggle or suffer or develop symptoms as the neurotic does. They are normal not in what may be called the absolute sense of the word; they are normal only in relation to a profoundly abnormal society."

Their perfect adjustment to that abnormal society is a measure of their mental sickness. These millions of abnormally normal people, living without fuss in a society to which, if they were fully human beings, they ought not to be adjusted, still cherish 'the illusion of individuality,' but in fact they have been to a great extent deindividualized. Their conformity is developing into something like uniformity. But "uniformity and freedom are incompatible. Uniformity and mental health are incompatible too. . . . Man is not made to be an automaton, and if he becomes one, the basis for mental health is destroyed."

-- Aldous Huxley, Brave New World Revisited

The Consumer is King

The consumption of mass produced goods, coupled with the Puritan work ethic where God rewarded hard work, meant prosperity could be regarded as an indication of God's favor. Wealth was therefore more than a mere status symbol, it had become a testimonial virtue. The consumer was crowned the King. By the 1980's Bernays' techniques had worked so well that the American population had been transformed into a veritable consuming machine. Psychoanalysis changed from trying to get people to buy a limited range of mass produced goods to the focus of what psychology called the self-actualizing individual. Bernays was the first person to link people's emotional connection to products as expressions of what they called the "inner self."

Capitalism created the "individual" by marketing products to his so called inner values. The corporations began to convince people that they were unique and then offer to them ways to express it. The notion that you could buy an identity replaced the idea that you were free to create one. Instead of inner animal desires being controlled for the good of society; like Freud taught; the inner self did not need to be repressed and controlled. It should be allowed to express itself. Do what thou wilt. Out of this would come a new type of human being-- "the self." But this was an isolated and greedy self, far more vulnerable to manipulation by those who would control them by feeding their infinite desires. With the new “self” people’s wants seemed to have no limit which was perfect for the corporations. They became increasingly dependent for their identity on business. What you wear became a statement reflecting your inner self and self-expression was reduced to what a person could afford to buy.

The satisfaction of the inner desires of the Self became man’s highest priority. Perhaps this is the part of the spirit of Horus--The Crowned and Conquering Child-- that Crowley meant to invoke upon the earth in the twentieth century. This was a spirit of childish selfishness that Bernays and his hidden masters helped create, a culture that Crowley could only dream of. It was a society composed entirely of spoiled brats.

In psychology the Self is identified with the Ego. The Id, Ego, and Super-Ego are the three parts defined in Freud’s structural model of the psyche, although these terms are not his own; they are translations. Freud himself wrote of “das Es,” “das Ich,” and “das Über-Ich”—meaning “the It”, “the I”, and the “Over-I” or “I above.” The Id is the unorganized part of the personality that contains the basic drives. It acts according to the “pleasure principle”, seeking to avoid pain. According to Freud, we are born with our Id. The mind of a newborn child is regarded as completely “id-ridden” in the sense that it is a mass of instinctive impulses and needs immediate satisfaction. The id wants whatever feels good at the time, with no consideration for the reality of the situation or for other people’s feelings. When the child is hungry, uncomfortable, in pain, too hot, too cold, or just wants attention, the id speaks up until its needs are met. The id knows no judgments of value, no good and evil, no morality. The “It” doesn’t care about reality, about the needs of anyone else, only its own satisfaction. When the id wants something, nothing else is important. Within the first three years, as the child interacts more and more with the world, the second part of the personality begins to develop. Freud called this part the Ego. The Ego recognizes the individual, the self. It is all about me, me, me; I, I, I. It understands that other people have needs and desires, however, it’s the ego’s job to meet the needs of the id.

By the age of five, the Super Ego should have developed. This is the moral part of us that feels a connection to everything. Many equate the superego with the conscience as it dictates our belief of right and wrong. It would be where the sense of guilt or empathy comes from by living an opulent lifestyle while others have nothing. The super ego would recognize that all is one and there is no such thing as “good for me, bad for you.” The ego is constantly swinging back and forth between meeting the needs of the id and grappling with more altruistic nature of the super ego.

By locking us into our lower immature selves—the id and the ego, consumer culture has conquered our society by using our own selfish natures to do so. Instead of being child-like, we are behaving childishly, manifesting the worst possible aspect of childhood—the self-centered brat....

SUBLIMINAL MESSAGES: PROGRAMMING YOURSELF TO RESIST PROGRAMMING

by MR. LOBO

Some deny that there are subliminal messages anymore. THIRSTY. Supposedly it's banned in the UK and the United States, right? THIRSTY. It really doesn't work anyway, right? THIRSTY. They did that stuff in the 50's and it's banned people will assure you. THIRSTY.

Subliminal means literally "below the threshold" of conscious perception. Parts of the brain are activated without the subject being aware by very fast or masked visual and audio stimuli.

To capitalize on the topic of subliminal messages and the deep fear that the CIA wanted us to eat more popcorn, a film called TERROR IN A HAUNTED HOUSE(1958) was the first to use a technique they called PYCHORAMA followed by A DATE WITH DEATH(1959). Funny, poorly illustrated ghoul faces flashed on the screen(lingering a bit too long to be subliminal for the attentive viewer) to induce horror. There was a snake supposedly to make us hate, hearts to inspire love, and the words "blood" to creep us out.

In the film Alfred Hitchcock's PSYCHO(1960), during a dissolve near the end of the film Norman Bates face is subtly superimposed with a skull.

The Words SCREAM and MURDER were allegedly in the original shower sequence. This film effected movie goers deeply and generations of people developed a fear of showers.

THE EXORCIST(1973) used subliminal stimuli to scare and disturb deeper than ever before. The face of Father Karras becomes a full-screen death mask for two frames, A Demon face and the word PIG are hidden throughout the movie. Squeals of slaughtered pigs and the buzzing of aggravated bees were supposedly mixed subtly into the sound track.

DISNEY came under fire for the discovery of an erect penis in the castle behind THE LITTLE MER-MAID(1989) of the VHS clam-shell box art. The video was recalled but calls attention to the fact there are skulls, devil horns, and sexual innuendo hidden in many DISNEY projects. This could be chalked up to a lot of bored underpaid overworked artists with passive aggressive axes to grind.

Famously FIGHT CLUB(1999). Tyler Durden(unnamed in the film) splices images of pornography into family movies that play at the movie theater where he works. And in the larger film we are experiencing is laden with flashes of subliminal imagery and clues. At the end of the film Tyler plants controlled explosives to implode all New York's bank buildings to reboot the economy by cancelling all the debts. Supposedly this Symbolized the Freemason and The Illuminati plan to erase their debts with the events of 911. But let's drop this as the first rule about FIGHT CLUB is to not talk about FIGHT CLUB.

Conspiracy Theorists can supply you endless 911 references found in pop culture leading up to the event in everything from THE SIMPSONS, to the 2001 trailer for SPIDERMAN(2002), to the X-FILES spin off THE LONE GUNMEN. I'm not here to discuss the value of subliminally warning or preparing us for that event. It obviously didn't make a difference.

Studies suggest that subliminal messages have an effect when the messages are goal-related. Planting the "Co-cola" logo in your brain does not make you thirsty. But if you are thirsty you might be very well choose that brand. I always find it funny how violently righteous people are when they're faced with a brand of sugar-water that's not in accord with their programing. "Pepsi? Blechh! I ONLY drink COKE! C'mon, Ethyl, let's leave!" There is less than one percent difference in the two beverages and they are identical in color and contain practically identical ingredients. Orange Rind Vs. Lime Rind is the biggest difference and subtle disparity of Sweetness Vs. Carbonation.

This may be considered evidence to support the argument that genius marketing and subliminal cues can change behavior. Quiet subtle environmental elements can bend minds and create subcultures. A smooth bland form of commercially commissioned music called Muzak played in supermarkets, shopping malls, airports, and elevators everywhere when I was a lad and was credited with more sales and customers moving at a slower pace. I remember laughing out loud in the frozen food section as the Easy Listening version of "Whip It!" the only chart topper by my all-time favorite New Wave band DEVO wafted through the aisles of unsuspecting shoppers.

downtown ARCO for years.

There was also a freeway underpass that was a pedestrian walkway from the downtown parking garages to a local tourist area that had a problem with vagrants and graffiti artists. They employed the same sonic warfare. Blaring orchestral strings at alarming decibels to keep everyone moving.

Alex's futuristic gang of Beethoven loving DROOGS from Stanley Kubrick's A CLOCKWORK ORANGE(1971) must have evolved in from these environmental tactics.

Is this ethical? What about free will? Don't we have a right to steal produce if we're so inclined? Wasn't this the central theme to A CLOCKWORK ORANGE? Is it BAD to try to force someone to be GOOD.

Kubrick explores a teenage serial rapist and murderer who is reprogrammed by the government using a technique of showing him films of violence and using drugs as negative reinforcement to make him sick. Much like hypnotherapists would make you associate a sour taste with cigarette smoking. A woman Alex murders has a painting on her wall depicting a woman with the breasts cut out of her clothing--suggesting a larger cultural trend which Alex is conforming and responding to. Society seems to be influencing him to do both bad and good. First he was getting positive reinforcement for doing wrong. Then he was getting negative reinforcement for doing wrong. But perhaps the fact that Alex was frighteningly suggestible in an ultra-violent culture made him commit crimes in the first place.

Ultimately, I think, you have to be receptive to what's being offered to you as information...even if it's suggested to you subliminally.

Even then I heard the urban legends about subliminal messages and tried to hear them. Sometimes I could perceive murmurs but they were so discrete that I couldn't tell what they were trying to tell me. I didn't feel like buying more stuff than usual???

Like many performers with dreams of entertaining the masses, I worked at a restaurant in a shopping center. When slow elevator music became passe in favor of "The Hits of the 90's and Beyond" I discovered a huge box of Muzak Corporation labeled CDs in the trash. Without their companion sound system and on my home stereo with headphones I could finally hear those murmurs. They were obvious and ham-fisted.

"Don't Steal. Stealing Is Wrong. People Won't Like You."

Tears of laughter streamed down my face. This was somehow both--far less AND far more insidious than I could imagine or create.

This effected me. This wasn't an attack. It was defense. Like blaring classical music in front of inner city gas stations to keep hoodlums away...which they did at the

Some people are more susceptible to suggestion...but it doesn't always work the way you might think. My wife and I sat in a restaurant. The TV was chattering on the other side of the room-ESPN, I think. My wife and I are not sports fans we're film buffs. Even though, The conspiracy theorist in me always believed sports were designed to distract and pacify the masses--a point of view nurtured by the fact that I have no physical coordination and was picked on by jocks all through school--But I found my self glancing over at the TV screen occasionally as we munched on Pizza Buffet. My wife had her back to the TV. The sportscaster boldly stated that a certain quarterback was a "powerhouse". My wife started humming on cue..."Boom Da-Dum B-dada-da-dat! Boom Da-Dum B-dada-da-da-dat! Boom Da-Dum B-dada-da-da-dat! B-dada-da-da-dat daaa-dum!" Cartoon pistons from Warner Brothers "Looney Tunes" whirled in my head as I recalled the theme. I imagined Sylvester the Pussycat being tortured in an infernal machine--then made the connection. I laughed at my wife's absurdist joke. "A lot of people don't know that song is called Powerhouse.", I said with a mouth full of pasta salad. She stared. Oh, really. I just know it from the cartoons. Then I explained that the man on the TV said Powerhouse just before she started humming Raymond Scott's Powerhouse. "Really? I was trying to ignore the TV." She said.

This wasn't the first time I had witnessed Dixie's almost spooky ability to subliminally pick up on things. We joked about it and I had a unsettling thought. As Spectral Narrator for my TV series CINEMA INSOMNIA...I say in my best daddy voice, at the opening of every show "You are under My Power". I wondered if my marriage to Dixie was somehow influenced or ensured by my choice of words as a TV MOVIE HOST. If so I must be careful not to break the spell.

Working as a media professional, I studied marketing and commercial art. Artists and entertainers are manipulators as much as politicians or cult leaders...However, the subject...just like in Hypnosis must be receptive to the message or it doesn't work. Our instructors showed us the ice cubes in the scotch glass from the magazine ads that had naked orgies hidden in them, The Crystal Light ad with the pipework and gym equipment along the back wall spelling out the word SEX, and the movie theater announcements with the words "thirsty" and "popcorn" flashing in a 1/24th of a second. Advertisers use subliminal messages to trick you into spending money but can these techniques be used to manipulate people for their own benifit? And is that ethical?

I read about my favorite band DEVO. They supposedly came from a background of Advertising and were very visual. Their Student film...THE BEGINING WAS THE END: THE TRUTH ABOUT DE-EVOLUTION(1976) using the "Popcorn", "Thirsty", technique had the words "Submit" and "Obey" hidden in it and supposedly won honors at every film festival it was screened.

The band's co-founder, Mark Mothersbaugh, whom I met at his studio in 1995, scored hundred of TV commercials for big corporate clients including the soft drink KOOL AID. He joked that he included comments just below the noise floor like "KIDS, DON'T EAT SUGAR". The ad execs could hear them but laughed it off and allowed him to include this subversion into the final ads broadcast on TV.

A master of experimental electronic music--He also said he has spent decades trying to discover what he calls "the brown noise"...a low frequency tone that make an entrie audience of concert goers defecate in their collective pants simultaneously. Lucky for us he hasn't found it as my wife and I have seen them in concert and maintained dry seats throughout.

However, we are true fans of this band. Fanatics. Blindly devoted. Constantly bring DEVO and their work up in conversation...even here in this article. Are we both under the spell of this musical Svengali and his pogo-inducing psychotronic music? If we are being manipulated--we are receptive to this manipulation.

Armed with the inspiring influence of a fellow artist I considered the potential of subliminal suggestion and it is a corner stone of my work.

The Intro of CINEMA INSOMNIA is one continuous take with no cutaways that pulls you in...you go into a hypnotic eyeball, enter a wormhole and are deposited in deep space floating through a vortex of floating cartoon icons. My voice is commanding but reassuring...the movie clips are flying at you in gaudy cartoon picture frames like high art...as we pass through each frame a "bullwhip" sound is heard spanking the credo home "They're not bad movies...Just Misunderstood". The last sound is a Halloween dungeon victim stretched on the rack as the logo swings in and out of frame. Submit. Obey. Enjoy these terrible movies.

Mr. Lobo isn't trying to bully you into like my show. I'm just trying to intimidate you into bullying yourself into liking my show. People create barriers that prevent them from doing things they truly want for themselves. People need permission to like things and sometimes they deny themselves that permission. I can't make you like my show unless deep down you want to. Is a little bit of brain bullying a bad thing?

I believe most Hypnotism is the art of tricking your own mind with subconscious bullying.

Hypnotism is a reoccurring theme of CINEMA INSOMNIA. With the "Insomniac Oath" viewers look into my unblinking eyes and promise to watch "The Movie, The Whole Movie, and Nothing But The Movie" as an hypnotic spiral spins.

When the spiral comes out--even though, it's a joke--some viewers get scared. Many still believe that hypnosis represents a threat to the subconscious mental security of the individual. These people are not in a sub-conscious state but a self-conscious state...and if you are feeling self-conscious, I want you to mentally put one foot into your cradled hands, put your other foot on your shoulder, and try to get over yourself.

Mark Mothersbaugh said that revolution is obsolete. That subversion is the new method to change peoples behavior. You can bet that governments, corporations, and marketing executives are subtly trying to manipulate you all the time. Even your Mother-In-Law is probably dropping subtle cues that burrow in your brain and that you're passive aggressively resisting.

In my new spoken word project, HYPNOSIS FOR HIPSTERS, Mr. Lobo shows you how others are bullying your brain all the time and how to use the power of positive brain bullying on yourself.

This can be done through a kind of self-hypnosis and harnessing what Mr. Lobo calls your "mega mental energy for better thinksmarts". In my humorous take-off on self help programs I use satire to break down the manipulative malarkey of other supposed self-help programs...but also show you how to sidestep the traps of manipulators.

Everyone is trying to manipulate you...Doctors, Parents, Teachers, Artists...everyone. Some of us are trying to manipulate the masses for the positive other than the negative. "Kids, Don't Eat Sugar". "Don't Steal. Stealing is Wrong--People Won't Like You". "They're not Bad Movies--Just Misunderstood."

Your best defense? Assert your own feelings. Think for yourself. Know what you want. No one can make you do what you don't want to. But if you don't know what you want, you may allow yourself be taken over by default. The music you listen to, the clothes you wear, and what you surround yourself with is how you program yourself...and protect yourself from ideas that aren't in accord with what you believe are your best interests. Viddy Well, my Droogies! Viddy Well!

GHOSTS OF THE NEPHILIM: PART I

by Frater X

Life is a continuous series of realizations.

And, as it turns out, truth is far stranger than fiction...

I must warn you now, dear reader, if you are comfortable with the way things are in our world, if you are happy with the status quo and you simply want to pursue that happiness without making waves or asking questions, then you may not enjoy this article. I know for certain I am here to afflict the comfortable and comfort the afflicted. But, then again, why would you be reading this magazine at all if you were comfortable with the way things are?

I've got an axe to grind here because I just returned from an escapade into the "sheep-fold" of narrow-minded fundamentalism. I presented the research you will be reviewing here in this article at the Back to the Future Conference recently in Austin, Texas.

I consider Austin friendly territory. I started broadcasting live on Saturday nights in 2011 on American Freedom Radio Network, out of Austin, and continued to do so for the next three years uninterrupted with great response from Austin listeners. I also released my first DVD, The Secret War On Human Consciousness (an article of the same name appeared in Paranoia #57) at Brave New Book Store; a veritable mecca of truth in Austin, right on the edge of UT campus. Such notables as Freeman Fly, Alex Jones, and Jim Marrs have presented their research and media there in the past.

I really have been spoiled too. With the successes of the Free Your Mind conferences; as well as, the Conspiracy Conference in Palo Alto, California, and the Paranoia Conference in San Diego. I have had nothing but positive support and feedback with regards to my media and research. People genuinely want to hear the context I am creating from my perspective on things. Over all very validating experiences. Its been great!

And a synchromystic-truther outlook, mission or movement of sorts has developed; to create a "new theosophy", or wisdom of the divine, for the individual in the 21st century using the very same elite tools of enslavement to free minds instead.

So when I ventured forth into the proverbial viper's den of evangelical outlook and approach to reality, it was a whole different ballgame. They weren't having the "idolatry" I was dishing out, that was very clear after the first talk I gave, containing within the body of research found here in this article.

Many of us in our postmodern new-media movement, the so-called "truthersphere", share a collective destiny. Whether research blogger, podcaster, writer, lecturer, film-maker, musician, or computer graphic artist (or all these rolled-up in one), we develop one thesis after another which we produce and present for public scrutiny and review.

We are, in effect, renegade professors from all mediums and we have no tenure. As "Rogue Scholars", we have no established scholastic infrastructure to support us; and for most of us the field of "New Media" is not specialized, either. We must know as much as we can about everything; and there is so much research out there! Which is why we sell books, magazines, and DVDs, go to conferences-such as the one filled with born again Christians in Austin, Texas-and try to free those minds ensnared by our deadly culture.

The intrusion of "Mother Culture", via Neurolinguistic Programming mass-consciousness engineering, bleeds through our awareness as the adversary at every turn, challenging connections, conclusions, and convictions with control paradigms masked as virtual persona-like a digital conscience-a still, small voice ever suggesting the "right" path to take. Consensus reality has been fully realized through virtual reality and the "proscenium arch-way" from the theaters of old; the lines separating real-life from illusion are more blurry than ever.

As I already stated above, I am here to afflict the comfortable and comfort the afflicted. Through my new book The Secret War Inside Freemasonry, released this last December, I am shaking the pillars of the American Masonic Lodge System as a whole; turning over the money-changers tables and tearing away the veil of that proverbial Temple.

Through my work with The Middle Chamber Internet radio podcast, which I produce and broadcast worldwide, I set about dispelling the myth of progress in our culture, smashing delusions, decoding and reverse-engineering reality, with special emphasis on the esoteric and occult.

I started out as a wandering "dharma bum", a mystic road kid without direction except away from conformity. And I, like many of my fellows here on this quest for truth, have traveled far from the warm campfires of human civilization, in search of the American Zeitgeist the lost spirit of our times. A journey which after many highs and lows, eventually led me to the doors of the Masonic Lodge.

During my time in the lodges of Freemasonry, I did gain access to much information developing wisdom and understanding of the past through the secret teachings of all ages, cloistered and sequestered in the ancient writings, rituals, and ceremonies in many of the oldest occult and esoteric orders and their private libraries.

These Masonic orders have encoded within their esoteric teachings, rituals and ceremonies, knowledge and understanding of ancient accounts, myths, and legends from another age of humanity; forgotten, overlooked and withheld from our collective everyday awareness.

As I have often said; you can have all the knowledge and information in the world, yet without the proper context it profits none.

Hence the remarkable condition in our postmodern world; all the information at our fingertips and still we seem to be slipping into a new dark age.

The relevance of the Watchers-the Fallen Angels from the Old Testament book of Genesis chapter 6-and their offspring, the Nephilim to our story as a species cannot be overstated.

What have we to learn from these almost forgotten, and easily dismissed tales of antediluvian history; from the last days of the Golden Age of Humanity, elaborated on in many other apocrypha, or extrabiblical works, outside the Bible, such as the Books of Enoch, Jubilees, and Jasher? What is the connection between the Flood, Noah, and the Fallen Ones from Heaven? Do we not find parallels in other cultures and folklore around the world? What answers do they have for us in our current age? What can we learn from this all?

We suspect any true biblical account of humanity has been obscured by a hybrid, “elite oligarchy”, an ancient bloodline which controls every level every facet of human existence, especially the tenets and dogma of organized religions. Are there stories in between the narrative of the lines of scripture in The Bible?

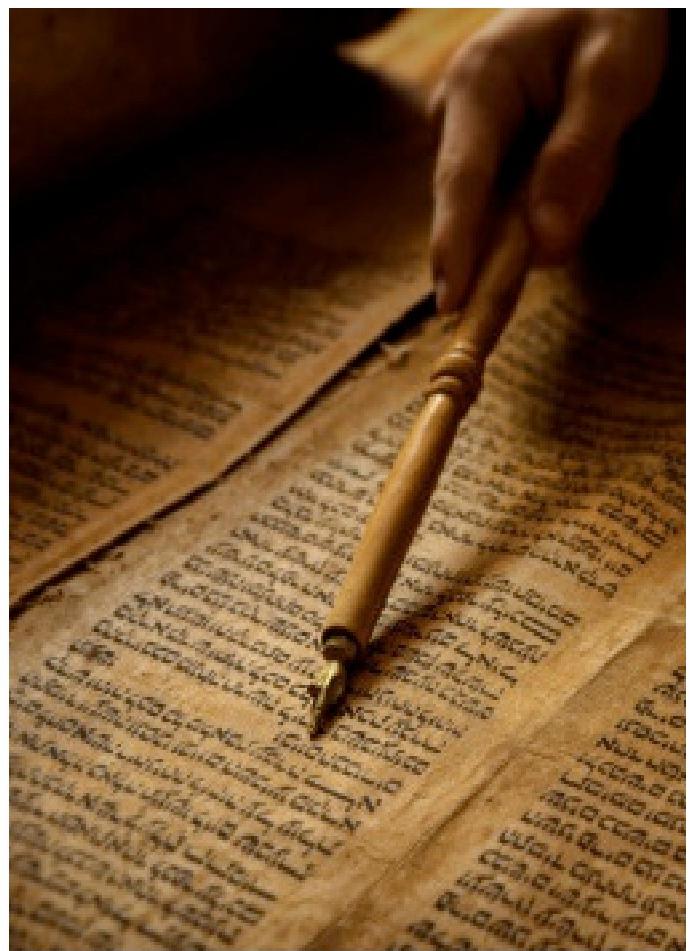

The most powerful tools we have for understanding the people and stories depicted in the Bible are contained within the writings outside the biased oversight and approval of both the Cross and Crown; the books and gospels outside the Holy Canon, such as the Dead Sea Scroll fragments, the Nag Hammadi Codices, and the scores of other apocryphal writings-edited, abridged, and rewritten down through history. Through these extra-biblical works we can somewhat complete the fragmented narrative in our quest for context. These materials are indispensable for our research here please refer to the endnotes for more resources and references.

When you read Genesis closely, if one chose to do such a thing, you realize there are at least two creation stories contained within the scripture: first, the creation of humanity as a species, and then, the creation of Adam and Eve as a sub-group. Much of the theological creation story was left out of the “final draft”. The same is true for all the most potent “mythic histories” contained in the Bible.

Of course, we have not fully addressed the inherent flaw in viewing reality from the strictly “bibliocentric”, or Bible-centered, perspective.

I will, at some point in this series of articles exploring this topic, suggest and discuss research reconsidering the Bible as a contrived weapon of conquest for humanity with the world religions organized as elaborate systems of mind control and obedience . Citing the voluminous combined works of many of the original Dead Sea Scrolls scholars, such as Professor Robert Eisenman’s essential works, as well as Professor Hugh Schonfield, James Robinson, and John Allegro; and a whole host of other authors and researchers who followed them.

The groundbreaking reinterpretation of biblical scriptures, using the template of typology as suggested by researcher and new-media producer Joseph Atwill, in his collected works under the banner of Caesar’s Messiah:

How the Roman Flavians Invented Christianity, is extremely useful in this context.

I would ask you to reserve judgment and bear with me as I elaborate. I am not denying there were, and are, real ways of liberation from suffering and “sin”, or “hamartia” in the Greek, meaning the arrow missed its mark. These ways were being preached and practiced in the Holy Land in the first century by an authentic and most righteous teacher, whom the world would come to remember as Jesus, though it was obviously not his real name.

All of this, I would simply suggest, occurred along with and possibly as an extension of the wisdom traditions; the Ancient Mysteries preexistent in the East, near and far, going back to time immemorial. Who am I to say one way or the other? I do, however, call into question the organized religions that sprang up, that co-opted and amalgamated the names and teachings of these ascetic movements and their leaders in and around the Jordan Valley regions; all for empire, for the profit and gain of the few bloodline oligarchs of that time which happen to remain in power still to this today.

With the fall of Jerusalem in 70 AD, the Flavians Titus and Vespasian seized all the Jewish scribes (the religious scholars of the day), rounded them up, and put them to work laying the foundation for what would become the new Rabbinical Judaism, and the Holy Roman Church, which was midwifed into existence by the last Flavian Emperor Constantine, and his co-conspirator Bishop Eusebius at the Nicaean Council in the 4th century.

The Flavian program created new systems of theology; mystical and religious ideologies for the entire empire and all its subjects. The empire was in fact, a veritable melting pot of cultures and beliefs. What was needed was a new psycho-social magical effect through myth, legend, and spirituality. A religious manipulation as has been employed throughout the ages. All the great empires provided state religions for the masses.

The populace must be trained to obey, all work towards the common cause of the city-state and its leaders; symmetry in social action ruled by a demigod-like social elite, reinforced by a holy priesthood. Since ancient times architecture, hand in hand with other social structures of the city-state, reinforces the socio-political/magical elements of mind-control encoded within the civic mythology.

A symmetrical building modulates a frequency vibration on a metaphysical level, effecting the senses imperceptibly, which may be used to reinforce the civic mythology perpetuated by an elite class creating an expansive view of and for the people.

Ancient knowledge and wisdom was sequestered away from the rest of humanity, controlled by Church hierarchy and aristocratic privilege. This knowledge was gradually released first in the time of the Renaissance, and then during the so-called Enlightenment, to the initiates of the secret orders and fringe sects.

I have a rare and unique perspective being exposed to such knowledge withheld from the rest of the world. Real game-changing stuff, such as the fact that Freemasonic scholars, ritualists, and hermetic practitioners in the British Isles and the Royal houses of Europe had access to extra-biblical texts and materials like the lost gospels and the Book of Enoch-long before the rest of humanity-as evidenced by the apocryphal and Enochian themes and imagery encoded in the early versions of Freemasonic rituals, right up to today's modern Cryptic Masonry degrees. The rest of the uninitiated, or “profane” humanity, would have to wait until the 20th century to gain access to such secrets.

Secrets cloistered in the Holy Orders, or erased from history by the Roman Church Magisterium, were most certainly discovered and resecreted by the original Knights Templar, as well. Yet, miraculously, secret truths were preserved for almost 2,000 years on scrolls cached in caves overlooking the river Jordan.

Life is a series of realizations.

And the truth is far stranger than fiction...

This might explain some of the traditional animosity felt towards most Freemasonic orders by the Church of Rome. All the difficult truths out there challenging the claims of the Vicar of Christ and his one Universal Church in the world. So many truths floating around in legend and lore.

The suppression of the truth about the Watchers and their offspring, the Nephilim, being the proverbial tip of the iceberg. According to the ancient writings found in those caves near Qumran and the Dead Sea, the Watchers and the Nephilim influenced humanity biologically and intellectually for over 11 centuries. For almost 12 hundred years they interfered with humanity's development before the flood interrupted their activities.

In the time of Jared (the seventh son after Adam and father of Enoch, whose name meant "in the time of the descent"), the Fallen ones came down on top of Mt. Hermon, at the river Jordan ("place of the descent"), in the same area where that cache of scrolls would eventually reveal their truth...humanity and the world would never be the same.

Long ago a deal was made whereby "divine" beings from heaven would exchange knowledge and technology for access to human females, and in effect, access to our gene pool. They taught humans the dark arts; all things forbidden, black magic and sorcery, also metallurgy, warcraft, and statecraft, even, we are told, the making of dyes and facial make-up. Taking the daughters of man as wives the Fallen Ones beget the giants, monsters, and heroes of antiquity and beyond.

The Elohim (a plural term taken to mean "God" in the singular and almighty), according to scripture, decreed humanity defiled by the Watchers and their offspring. And the Watchers were made to witness the destruction of their progeny; hybrid abominations of angel and man. The Nephilim were rounded up and put to avenging angel's sword; then came the flood for the rest, as the deluge swept the world clean. But that is not the end of the story.

We must conclude some of them survived because of numerous accounts of them, after the flood, all the tales, myths, and fables handed down throughout history, and into the more recent past, of giants, monsters, and heroes with godlike attributes, these super human beings credited with founding civilizations across the globe.

In Roman lore we are told of Mars-the God of war- who raped the vestal virgin, Rhea Sylvia-as most of the gods of Rome and Greece were inclined to do-producing Romulus and Remus, hybrid offspring of divine and human parents, who were by definition Nephilim under a different cultural guise. We learn from the tale that Romulus built the city-state of Rome in the 8th century BC, after murdering his brother Remus; very Nephilim indeed.

Ancient German Myth tells us the walls of Asgard were built by a frost giant to separate the realm of the gods from that of the frost giants, who were known as the "Niflheim". Norse giants were called "Jotun", a word rooted in the meaning "to eat", which alludes to their monstrous appetites. Mesoamericans had firmly established origin myths about their civilizations and giants. The Mayans believed their civilization was founded by giants. The Aztecs also believed their cities and their society had been established by giants and gods from the sky.

All the great monuments of the ancient world: Machu Pichu, the earthen tombs of China, Angkor Wat, the great earthen pyramid of the ancient American Indian city of Cahokia, and all the various mounds and ruins across the Americas, remain as evidence of engineering feats, which are busily dismissed and debunked by so-called experts in a multitude of cable programming. These feats, which not only defy production by human sweat and toil alone, but also our modern so-called advanced technologies to accomplish. A fact which clearly indicates humanity is quite possibly in a state of devolution, not evolution.

The Fallen Ones, we are told the Watchers who started all the trouble, were bound for eternity to await judgment in the end times. Their offspring, the Nephilim, did not simply perish though their earthly bodies were killed. The Book of Enoch tells us the divine spirits of these hybrids of angel and man are eternal and everlasting, but being half-human mortals, their spirits were trapped in our material realm, bound to the earth in a sort of half-life, a purgatory, an inescapable prison; disembodied spirits, fated to haunt and torment humanity throughout the ages, exacting revenge for their punishment.

As if it were a special quality of their existence, these beings share their lineage with humanity, like a twisted off-shoot in our gene pool; they are distant cousins to our species, inexorably connected to us. Folklore and legends speak of evil spirits causing destruction and despair to humanity wherever possible. Beliefs arose in folklore that a “daemon”, from the Greek for disembodied spirit, would step in and “change” places with the departing soul.

Fables of “changelings”, switched at birth, or of the very old or very young, suffering with some terminal affliction, brought right to death’s door only to suddenly recover spontaneous remission when all hope seemed lost; but there was something different about the survivor now...something colder and darker, the stories would say...they seemed like not the same person as before...and maybe they weren’t. Maybe the ghost of a dead Nephilim went into their body at the last minute, at the “host’s” point of no return, and took over? The “reanimated” body would go forth and live a lifetime as a possessed person few would notice the difference.

Western Solomonic ceremonial magick encourages the aspiring adept practitioner that he must attain the knowledge and conversation of one’s “holy guardian angel”. One is also instructed that interaction with mysterious thought-forms and entities called “egregores”, or grigori a word which draws its root and meaning from-wait for it-the Nephilim, is an empowering integral part of the ritual dynamic!

The magickal belief, or metaphysical principle, being that egregores form spontaneously or deliberately around any ritualized, and repetitive, actions or behavior. These magickal “servitors”, or thought-forms, take on a life of their own it seems, once they have drawn enough power generated from the collective will of the human, or humans, manifesting it through ritual or rote behavior. Spirit entities form around repetitive acts.

And so, a Lodge operating in the same space and time, set and setting, repetitively for centuries would form such a “servitor”, which would eventually take on a life of its own and preserve its existence through the group. Author John Michael Greer wrote in his book Inside a Magical Lodge: “Any symbolic pattern that has served as a focus for human emotion and energy will build up an egregore of its own over time, and the more energy that is put into such a pattern, the more potent the egregore that will form around it. The gods and goddesses of every religion, past and present, are at the centers of vast egregore charged with specific kinds of power. This power is defined by, and contacted through, the traditional symbolism of the deity in question.”

An “ekklesia”, from the Greek for “group of humans”, with nefarious or ill intentions, could evoke an elemental thought form corresponding with such ill intent.

Which could easily happen with appendent orders to Freemasonry, numbering in the hundreds; as well as the thousands of orders outside the Freemasonic system all employing the same esoteric tools. Elite invitational orders whose existence remain secret until one is “tapped” to join, the candidate discovering only after he joins, his oaths are taken, what the group’s true intentions may be. And then its too late. Generation after generation of members all performing the same ritual functions month after month year after year. A powerful spirit entity could form around these actions.

The planting fathers and grid builders of the early colonial efforts here in the New World understood geomancy, or how to harness the earth’s energy patterns through symmetry, as well as architecture, harmonics, and the seven holy arts of the trivium and quadrivium; a knowledge base foreign to all but the most cosmopolitan gentleman men of the early enlightenment.

Queen Elizabeth’s court astrologer, Dr. John Dee, developed an Enochian magickal system which mapped ninety-one parts to the earth where the ley lines of the vast energy grid which surrounds the planet meet and criss-cross. The mounds of North America coincide with these convergences, as do ancient sites around the world. Ninety-one points on the globe governed by both a crossroad daemon and angel and their hosts.

Armed with such a chart, and the corresponding calls and sigils to bring forth various entities at will, an enterprising English explorer like Walter Raleigh or Francis Drake might evoke elemental forces to enlist and conciliate with their will to manifest Britannia the empire upon which the sun never sets...

And the Ghosts of the Nephilim seem to live on in global conquest and empire. Modified reformed reality in accordance with the will of an elite oligarchy. Render all things to Caesar! The usurpation of truth, cognitive dissonance, and controlled opposition through substitutionary replacement with false doctrines or teachings. An ancient bloodline of families creating a false “counter-clock world”, a paradigm of control based on obedience to the city-state, with a holy priesthood in place to sanctify the divine right of leadership

This model remains in play to the present day as seen by the two top prospects for presidential candidates being once again a Clinton and a Bush: two families suspected of not only being related to each other but also related to all the royal families of Europe! All one family! That one family owning the major media corporations used to prefabricate consensus reality through multi-media, computer-generated, virtual reality reinforcing the ruling paradigm and current elite’s right to rule.

Initiatory rites and holy and secret orders, while offering some illumination, insight and realization, by no means corner the market on any particular principles or teachings. They hold no exclusive rights to any of the high ideals or concepts espoused within their systems. These orders seem much more focused and geared towards obligating sensitive, insightful, and spiritually-minded people to marginalization through the gradual, or incremental, disbursement of limited and abridged wisdom. The master-initiate dynamic; strict hierarchical control and submission to the authority of an elaborate obedience training system.

Set and setting play an integral role in global enchantments, as well. It is no wonder our linear timeline of civilization draws a line of demarcation at the Flood point; humanity before the Flood and humanity after the Flood, along with special emphasis on builders and building tools. The tools to rebuilding society, to restoring order, play such a huge part in the “lodge work” and esoteric instruction in so many occult orders.

The symbolic tools of Western lodge systems; the square and compass, the plumb line and level-emblems of power, symmetry, and perfection reinforcing the post-deluvian trauma-based mind-control program. The primary psychic pattern recognition play, Ordo ab Chao (order out of chaos); as the state provides symmetry, the emblems of power represent the order of social control established after the chaos of cataclysm after the deluge.

This is a primary fear imprint in a long line of fear-based coercions, right up to the present-day rate of exchange here in America. “Liberty and Freedom”, our birth rights, are traded for “Security”, in the form of corporate fascism. And the vibration frequency pattern of control is maintained.

1Enoch is clear on the nature of the Watchers. They were possessors of science, magic, and knowledge; they taught humanity all the forms of knowledge which define civilization. The price for this gift was their offspring, the Nephilim, who were characterized more by their violence, dominance, oppression, and war towards humanity.

Setting themselves up as overlords, the Nephilim were the first slave masters of humanity, draining the species of all its precious resources. Their appetites were notoriously voracious which speaks not only to their high metabolism and strength but also to their psychological state which would have been driven by a powerful greed. They were not only violent towards humanity—the Nephilim would feast upon one another’s flesh as well... as lawlessness and chaos spread upon the earth.

In world mythology, giants are often symbols of chaos. It is evident there were both sexes of giants as generations of Nephilim and their tribes are recorded through ancient accounts. The word for Nephilim, in the Septuagint, is gigantes, meaning at its root, “born of the earth”. As a union of mutually exclusive elements they exist in a form of “bizzarro” anti-reality, gravitating towards chaos and bloodshed instead of order and peace.

We know they founded great city-state empires. They created the original languages of civilization. They were masters of symbolic comprehension and were certainly capable of a high level of its execution. Their main commodity was knowledge, which they inherited from their angelic forebears.

The religion of the giants and other Nephilim demi-gods was the Cult of Self. They worshiped themselves as divine and demanded their human subjects also worship them as such. They perpetuated the worship of The Watchers, their forefathers, as well. The Nephilim cults have always been bloody and gruesome fueled by war and human despair. Blood sacrifice in the ancient Levant demanded both human and animal victims.

This pattern we see continued by the bloodline oligarchs throughout known history with the Pharaohs of Egypt, the Greeks—with their Hellenistic ruler cults, the Romans’ Imperial Cult begun by Augustus, even the demi-god like status of billionaire CEOs, celebrities, and global leaders with their numerous bloodline connections today.

The Nephilim were also accomplished masons, builders, engineers, and artisans—their knowledge of the arts and sciences was extensive. When their numbers decreased after the flood, they built walled cities to protect their race. They also became mercenaries aligning themselves always with the enemies of the Israelites. They were apparently in control of a great many kingdoms in and around Canaan by the time of The Conquest.

Genesis 6:4 says: "...the Nephilim were on the earth in those days...and also afterwards..." Legends from before and after the flood, of unions between fallen angels from heaven and mortal women, and their offspring the giants, monsters, and heroes of renown, whose names live on through tribes of their own; throughout the scriptures there are ancient written accounts and traditions of names like: Anakim, Rephaim, Emim, Gibborim, Zamzummim, Awwin, and Avvites. Wherever these tribes and beings are mentioned, whether in the holy canon or the non-canonical texts, they are cited with great awe and terror. They were considered brutal warlike despots who enslaved humanity and devoured all the resources. And though many were destroyed in the flood, some were to survive and the scourge of the Nephilim lived on.

According to one ancient legend, preserved in the knowledge lecture of an obscure article dealing with the quasi-masonic degree called the Royal Ark Mariner (worked in lodges since at least 1790), the infamous giant Og promised Noah he would repent his tyrannical brutish ways, if he might be spared God's wrath. Thus did the giant cling to the outside of the Ark and ride out the flood in safety.

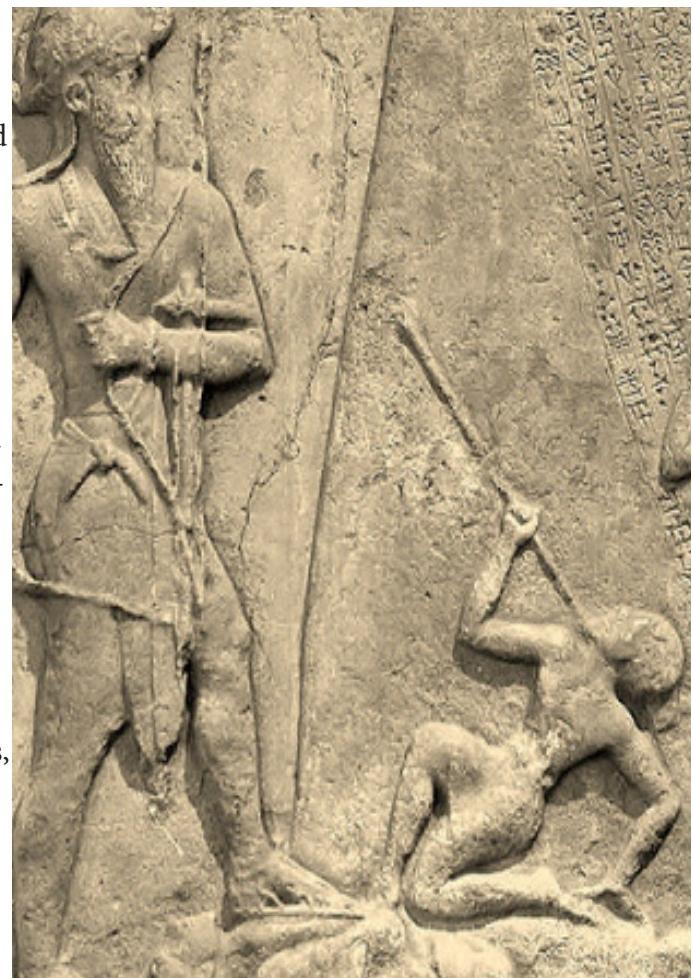

Og returns to legend later during the Conquest of Canaan as the mighty King of Bashan; his kingdom spanned the region east of the river Jordan and included Mount Hermon, the place of the descent of the original Watchers. Og's kingdom of Bashan maintained a long-standing reputation for agropastoral fertility and for its oak tree forests. The Israelites met Og and his mighty armies on the field of battle at Edrei, capital city of Bashan, heavily fortified with great gates and bars of wood and metal, according to Deut. 3:5

Though the Nephilim were destroyed by God's wrath through avenging angels, flood waters, and Israeli swords, their traits live on in the form of a preternatural infection, a spiritual and mental virus. This "mind-virus", carried and indeed embodied by not only in the human bloodlines, but also within a surviving species of daemonic spirit. The affliction survives. The oppressive and insatiable impulses of the Nephilim live on.

The hybrid offspring of beings from the heavens left behind a distinct ethnological record preserved within the Bible, and many other ancient great works and holy writings at the foundations our civilized world. There is a new paradigm our modern culture must address, consider, perhaps even take on board:

The Nephilim—the giants, monsters and heroes of old—were not only real, but were in fact at the root of human civilization, the great shift between hunter-gatherer and city-statehood! The Fallen Ones, called Watchers in the book of Enoch and "Archons" in Gnostic materials, developed a scheme to influence humanity for their own ends, trading knowledge and technology for access to our species.

The suppression of the truth about the Watchers and the Nephilim is consistent with the suppression of many truths, some great and others little known, yet vitally important. The rewriting of history over and over again by the oligarchs erases the whole picture, obscuring and repainting over any effective context.

Everything we think we know is wrong. We have been so very misled.

Jesus and his disciples were aware of the so-called apocryphal traditions, of all the extra-biblical traditions and texts, including accounts of the Watchers and Nephilim. Many references and allusions are made by them to this in the New Testament. The Bible also shows an understanding of a clear connection between evil, disembodied spirits and a host of spiritual afflictions and disease. Jesus is constantly healing people and exorcising daemons. The use of baptism for initiation into the Mysteries of Christ also harks back to the flood, cleansing the world just as the soul of the sinner is made clean by the holy waters of baptism.

The truth about the Messianic Dynasty and the bloodline of the Maccabees, along with all accounts competing with official Church dogma and doctrine, was reworked and deemphasized in the King James Bible in 1611, eventually being removed altogether, by esoteric operatives who, as practicing hermeticists, had knowledge unknown to common men; knowledge recovered going back of the Golden Age of humanity. Many secret doctrines and mystery traditions were sequestered away from the masses.

If the ghosts of the Nephilim became the infernal demons haunting humanity as evil spirits, egregores, and servants, combined with the bloodline oligarchs...what a perfect union for global control of the species.

As an after thought, let me say it is my belief at this point in my life, 45 years old with almost twenty years of marriage and four children, that we are supposed to intuit our own spiritual needs and artistically create our own religious approach to the sacred and divine, in real time, here and now, in whatever present reality-tunnel our belief system is currently rooted in.

The ancient Greeks spoke of a luminous epinoia which dwells within us all, the divine spark of creative visualization and imagination within, is the antidote to Archontic mental virus infestation. Gnostic Shamans recorded in the Nag Hammadi texts that Jerusalem was infested with “Archons”, their word for The Watchers.

The Apocalypse of James, another extra-biblical, work describes an abduction scenario involving three Archons. James tells us they will “come in threes...” The book offers a catechism, not unlike the Masonic question and answer phase of degree rituals, as a resistance to abduction. In this extra book of James’, we are told to stand our ground and declare ourselves to be of the everlasting “Preexistent One”, the Archons therefore having no dominion over us. Resist the devil and he will flee from you!

Which brings me to a final point. All the research, review, and theories regarding the manipulation of the human species in ancient times, and even today, by some outside organism of hyper-physical origin does not mean we are the product of extraterrestrial design. Beings from the heavens may have interfered with our growth and development, infected our gene pool with their DNA, and continue to interfere with our species on a psychic and metaphysical level to this day.

But we are not their property! This changes nothing in our everyday reality except the realization which confirms that things are not what they have seemed to be. Our goal remains the same at the end of the day, to “seek first the kingdom”. Seek the sacred and the divine in every moment, and be grateful for everyday we have to learn how to be the best at being who we truly are.

I choose an optimistic Utopian outlook on life with all our new media projects: Middle Chamber Media, Free-manTV Network, and The Friendship Agenda, the Free Your Mind movement, and Type1 ideologies.

Because in the end optimists find many more reasons to remain hopeful and keep moving forward, while the pessimist gives up and achieves no excellence.

What we share, the birthright of all humanity, is our collective knowledge and wisdom, our “gnosis”, our revelations! No one has the right or authority to limit or prevent a true seeker from accessing their own legacy!

In part two of this series, we will further explore the Masonic connections to the ancient accounts of The Watchers and their offspring the Nephilim...

KINETIC RETALIATION

by Clyde Lewis

On August 11, China's central bank devalued its tightly controlled currency, causing its biggest one-day loss in two decades. Gerald Celente of Trends magazine appeared on Ground Zero to announce that China has been rigging the game all along and that any kind of devaluating of currency or stocks or an economic sputter in China could plunge the United States economy as well.

The Chinese devalued their currency stating that the change would help drive the currency toward more market-driven movements. The move also signaled the government's growing worry about slow growth.

In the past, we have seen the rigging of the system by the world's flawed and fraudulent banking system at the expense of entire populations. Bank manipulations and money devaluating have sent economies into the bowels of hell, and poverty has been known to spark wars, fully funded by the banking systems that launder the money for criminal regimes.

A day later a terrible disaster struck China.

Two massive explosions in the port of Tianjin, northern China, killed more than a hundred people and left hundreds more injured and devastated large areas of the city.

It also left a huge crater in the ground.

The massive destruction was caught on a cell phone and the explosions were also felt as quakes registering 2.5 on the Richter scale.

The explosions took place at a warehouse at the port which contained hazardous and flammable chemicals, including calcium carbide, sodium cyanide, potassium nitrate, ammonium nitrate and sodium nitrate.

Officials insist it is not yet clear what triggered the blasts.

However, a website called Natural News has reported that Chinese dissidents are claiming that the “mainstream report” of the explosions is not the truth and that the truth is that the United States has fired the first shot in the war from space.

According to a Natural News story that has appeared in a recent Google news feed, the Tianjin explosion was waged as an act of “kinetic retaliation” by the Pentagon in response to China’s currency war Yuan devaluation. The Chinese government has put in place unprecedented secrecy surrounding the mysterious explosion, and aggressive police state tactics are now being invoked to control the flow of information surrounding this event.

Immediately following the massive explosion, the Chinese government began flying “black helicopters” in a formation across Beijing. The news site has provided pictures of American military helicopters patrolling the area looking over the damage that was caused in the explosions.

They also report that China is going to declare regional martial law in the next 18 days, in order to exercise total control over the movement of people and information. The government has banned reporters from entering the area and has begun arresting bloggers who promote what the government calls “conspiracy theories” regarding the cause of the massive explosion.

If a conspiracy theory has already been made, it would be the idea that there was an attack on Tianjin and that an alleged t a “rod” from a space based platform was dropped on the chemical plant as a stern warning shot from the United States, which is angered at the idea that China is on the verge of announcing its own gold-backed currency while declaring a fire sale on U.S. debt holdings.

The “Rod of God” weapon deployment by the U.S. Pentagon, is being said to be America’s “shot across the bow” to send a powerful warning message to China while disguising the attack as a domestic chemical explosion.

We are constantly hearing rumors about the millions of dollars that are secretly funneled into Pentagon projects that are blasted into space during secret launches. Their payloads are classified and while the final frontier used to be a means to generate hope and accomplishment it is now that dark void that has become a junkyard and a potential mine filed for weapons and payloads for war.

Ground Zero also reported Friday that Popular Science already blew the whistle on the secret space program and that Russia, China and the United States were already prepared for a space warfare scenario and that this would indicate that there has always been a secret space program that would fight wars in space, but also create a cause for orbital bombardment.

If we look back in history at proposed space weapons programs, we can see that there have always been plans in the works to make space the perfect place to keep weapons in order to have an advantage at first strike capabilities.

However, the tricky part is setting up weapons that don't violate nuclear treaties. The answer to this problem is to create weapons that don't have a nuclear payload but can do the same amount of damage.

This was accomplished with a program called 'Project Thor', a space-based weapons program – or at least an effective facsimile – that is believed to be secretly employed above us. 'Project Thor' was named after the hammer-wielding Norse god who could rain metal death down from heaven as he pleased.

project thor

'Project Thor' is basically summed up as "Rods from God" or "an orbiting tungsten telephone pole with small fins and a computer in the back for guidance." Once given the launch command, a satellite would drop the 'pole', which would then speed up until going at orbital velocity, around 10 miles a second. At this speed, when it hit a ground based target, it would have the explosive equivalent of a small-yield nuclear weapon and would also have great penetrating power because of its long, thin profile.

This program is the first example of what we now call "kinetic bombardment," using dense objects traveling at very high speeds to eliminate targets without the need of explosives, no need for nuclear bombs. The force would be similar on a smaller scale to that of a comet or meteor impact on the planet.

If a Kinetic Kill vehicle was used in Tianjin, it most certainly was a devastating test of might. The initial impact an explosion destroyed six city blocks.

On August 16th, the New York Times reported that the Obama administration has delivered a warning to Beijing about the presence of Chinese government agents operating secretly in the United States.

The New York Times also reported that American officials report that Chinese law enforcement agents covertly in this country are part of Beijing's global campaign to hunt down and repatriate Chinese fugitives and, in some cases, recover allegedly ill-gotten gains.

The Chinese government has officially named the effort Operation Fox Hunt.

The warning from President Obama, which was delivered to Chinese officials in recent weeks demanded a halt to the activities and reflects escalating anger in Washington about intimidation tactics used by the agents.

It comes at a time of growing tension between Washington and Beijing on a number of issues: from the computer theft of millions of government personnel files that American officials suspect was directed by China, to China's crackdown on civil liberties, and of course the devaluation of the currency.

There has been commentary that this attack, if it was an attack, has similar earmarks of the attack on Japan in the 1940's.

For those following the Shemitah theories, the dropping of atomic bombs on Japan also occurred during a Shemitah year, in the month of August, 1945, exactly 70 years ago. This is precisely TEN Shemitah cycles ago, or what might be called a "deca-Shemitah." Of course many people are saying that this Shemitah year will trigger a Black Swan event that will devalue the economy and plunge the world into war by this Fall.

It is also an interesting aside to report that one of China's supercomputers was forced to shut down for safety reasons. Though Liu Guangming, director of the National Supercomputing Center in Tianjin, said the Tianhe-1A supercomputer was running smoothly and protected by a reinforced room, it was still temporarily shutdown. Tianhe-1A can perform 2.57 quadrillion computing operations per second and was recognized as the world's fastest computing system in 2010.

Does anyone remember the real time website norsecorp.com where we saw real time attacks from China during the glitch that happened that had New York Stock Exchange shut down for three hours?

Elana Freeland, who recently published the book Chemtrails, HARRP, and the Full Spectrum Dominance of Planet Earth and is presently writing a book about the electromagnetic space fence has taken a keen interest in this story and is reporting that the U.S. government recently denied China access to technology needed to upgrade the Tianhe-2 supercomputer.

Last April, the IEEE Spectrum reported:

"When China wanted to upgrade Tianhe-2, currently the world's fastest supercomputer, it turned to U.S. chipmaker Intel. But the U.S. government has blocked Intel from helping with the tech upgrade and blacklisted several Chinese supercomputing centers over concerns for their involvement in nuclear weapons development. Experts warn that in the long run such a move may hurt the business of U.S. chipmakers and encourage China to speed up its homegrown chip development."

The U.S. Commerce Department initially denied Intel an export license for supplying chips to China's supercomputing centers last fall, according to the Wall Street Journal. The Commerce Department followed up by posting a notice on 18 February that listed the Chinese supercomputing centers as having been 'involved in activities contrary to the national security and foreign policy interests of the United States.' Specifically, the notice cited those centers' involvement in 'nuclear explosive activities' that could cover anything from research and development to testing.”

Although the denial of services to China could be seen as an attempt to hurt the rising superpower, some experts believe it will actually have the reverse effect of helping the Chinese economy and hurting the U.S. economy.

Elana Freeland asks “Is there any significance to the proximity of the explosion to the supercomputers?”

The explosion also comes just days after the U.S. Department of Defense accused the Chinese government of hacking “the personal emails of all top national security and trade officials.” While the source of this claim was reported by NBC News as “anonymous government sources,” it does make sense that China would attempt to hack the U.S. as both nations are currently in a struggle for global hegemony. The Guardian reported that:

“These attacks – among the more than 600 hacks attributed by officials to hackers working for the Chinese government – sought personal email info from top administration officials and began in 2010. NBC’s source said the hacks were still going on but would not name any of the officials targeted.”

The alleged Chinese hack comes after another breach attributed to hackers working for the Russian government. Again, the hacker claims come from “anonymous government sources” speaking to NBC. Wired reported that:

“The anonymous officials say the intrusion took place around July 25th and affected around 4,000 Joint Chiefs of Staff personnel (both military and civilian). It’s not entirely clear why the attack is being attributed to Russia. The Pentagon responded by shutting down the entire unclassified email system and internet during the investigation. The system has been shut down for around two weeks.”

Meanwhile “The CONtrail” internet site from Australia notified news groups the following:

Another news site from the United States called the Unhived Mind published pictures of a “lake crater” left behind by the explosion and states that the crater looks like it could have been made by a 5 kiloton nuclear blast.

“After looking through the images of the soviet nuclear tests, the new lake in China appears to have been made by a slightly sub surface burst of at least a 5 kiloton nuclear bomb... This was NOT an accident and the fracture pattern around the crater proves a sub ground burst. If it was a sub ground burst, then a small nuclear weapon is the biggest possibility because once a nuke has to push dirt, the blinding flash will not happen. A slightly subsurface detonation would explain why camera sensors did not get strange artifacts. And if it was not a nuke, it was something else incredibly huge, but not a fuel air bomb because fuel air bombs will not leave craters."—“The Unhived Mind.”

Popular Science explained that a space based “Rod from God” could simulate a nuclear explosion:

“When required these projectiles can be commanded to dive, singly or en masse, at targets on the Earth’s surface, smashing into the victim at orbital speed. As the projectile’s kinetic energy is released, the blast would be equivalent to a large conventional bomb.”

Furthermore:

“When instructed from the ground, the targeting satellite commands its partner to drop one of its darts. The guided rods enter the atmosphere, protected by a thermal coating, traveling at 36,000 feet per second—comparable to the speed of a meteor. The result: complete devastation of the target, even if it’s buried deep underground.”

The Pentagon in the past have denied that these weapons exist.

However, the “U.S. Air Force Transformation Flight Plan,” published by the Air Force in November 2003, references “hypervelocity rod bundles” in its outline of future space-based weapons, and in 2002, another report from RAND, “Space Weapons and Earth Wars” dedicated entire sections to the technology’s usefulness.

There are other interesting things to consider as well.

Back in 2008, President Bush had asked the Pentagon to come up with a plan to destroy a dead satellite that was heading to Earth. Many observers said a “shoot-down” was unnecessary because such objects falling to Earth typically burn up when re-entering the atmosphere.

Unless, of course, the satellite was possibly carrying ‘hypervelocity rod bundles’ made of tungsten. Out of all of the metals, tungsten has the highest melting point (3,422 °C) (6,192 °F), lowest vapor pressure, and the highest tensile strength. Tungsten has the lowest coefficient of thermal expansion of any pure metal. That means tungsten rods don’t burn up speeding through the Earth’s atmosphere to the intended target.

If the satellite was carrying kinetic weapons back then, there would be a definite reason to shoot it down. At the time, the shooting down of the satellite was “suspect” and the military said that they needed to eliminate the possibility of hydrazine, a toxic chemical, dispersing over a populated area. Many speculated that the reason why China and Russia were prompted to monitor the situation was that the countries were concerned about the missile and whether or not it was in reality a Pentagon weapons test.

After the shooting down the dead satellite, a United States policy on incoming near-earth objects was changed to state that all things that fall from the skies are classified.

U.S. military policy explicitly states that “incoming space debris, bolides and fireballs, are classified secret and that details about them falling in United States airspace are not to be released to the public.”

Now this policy was conveniently enacted at a time where Obama was monitoring China and their space activities. At the time, he was in support of President George W. Bush’s plan for space exploration. China at the time was planning its moon exploration program. After killing budgets for any moon or Mars launch, money was poured into the development and launch of surveillance satellites. The project cost the United States $10-billion dollars plus.

It was a Space-Based Infrared System that provides a more detailed infrared picture of Earth for battlefield surveillance, early-warning alerts and the U.S. missile defense program.

Is this a coincidence?

Most of the surveillance project is classified and I am sure the Pentagon would be uncomfortable if anything just happened to fall from the sky that would reveal that there is most certainly a secret space program.

So this Chinese explosion is now becoming a classified story.

Martial law and checkpoints have already begun in Beijing.

If this is part of a covert space war between China and the United States, we may see an escalation that would ultimately devastate the economies of both nations.

It would also be the first shot fired in the metaplanetary war.
